HISTORY

OF THE

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

THE GUARDIAN.—"It is certainly a convenience to have the history of Dissent in England presented in a connected form, and from a Dissenter's point of view. And for these purposes we can recommend this, which gives the history in a handy and convenient form."

TIMES.—"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Readers will find here in a clear and attractive form much information which cannot readily be found anywhere else."

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.—"It is essential that Dissenters and Methodist Churchmen should know why they stand apart from the National Establishment, and this knowledge can only come through the study of the ecclesiastical history of the last 300 years. . . . We ought to be specially grateful to Mr. Skeats and Mr. Miall for the light which they have shed upon the experiences of the Nonconformists of England."

THE PAYING GUEST

(Forming Vol. VI. of CASSELL'S POCKET LIBRARY).

Mr. George Gissing's story "The Paying Guest" is practically his first comedy. It is a delicious little bit of humour, fresh, sparkling, and abounding in skilful characterisation. The scene of the comedy is laid on the Author's own Surrey; but the grotesque ambitions of suburban life, fourteen miles from town, are here his subject rather than the more provincial phases of the county. To read the book one would think that Mr. Gissing had been converted suddenly to a cheery optimism. There is no moment of gloom from cover to cover. The vein is the lightest, and the volume will be a welcome surprise to many who have regarded this most able writer as the apostle of melancholy.

LITERATURE.

The Life and Times of James Ussher, Archbishop of Armagh. By J. A. Carr, LL.D., Canon of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

THE author of this biography has put together, in a moderate compass, a great deal of information scattered over the diffuse and voluminous labours of his predecessors. In less than four hundred pages he has given an account of Ussher's life, with notices of his principal works. The portrait frontispiece bears a certain family likeness to Lord Wolsley, accounted for (in a note to p. 16) by "the marriage of an ancestor with the Archbishop's branch of the Ussher family."

We are presented with a dismal picture of Ireland as it was at the beginning of Ussher's career. Dublin was a dirty, drunken city, with some good and comfortable houses; its suburbs touching the wild glens whence the savage "mountain men came down now and again to harry the citizens in the midst of their sports." Here and there in the city dwelt cultured folk who would meet in the cottage of Lodowick Bryskett to hear Spenser expound the plan of his great poem. But in the country was confusion and every evil work, barbarism and irreligion, thievish war and predatory waste, the peasantry "not Christyans, yvvel or humane creatours, but heathen, or rather savage and brute bestes." The worst accounts are fully justified by the State Papers. The churches were in ruins; the begging friars, "little better than outcasts themselves, were the true priests of the native Irish"; a bishop might be a notorious evil liver, and his cathedral "no better than a hog-stye." The "wicked" Archbishop of Cashel, Miles Magrath, "a special favourite of Elizabeth," held, besides his four bishoprics, six-and-twenty livings, and his sons and near relatives as many more. The people of his diocese "scarcely knew there was a God"; and even baptism was neglected. The episcopal succession, indeed, had not been broken: Mary had deposed some bishops, and Elizabeth some more; others, "albeit they were Papists," submitted to Elizabeth's government, and desired of the Deputy "that they might (by her Highness) be inducted into their ecclesiastical prelacy." But as an agency for good "the whole episcopal system had broken down."

James Ussher, whose family was of good social position in Dublin, was entered at the Free School of the Corporation when he was eight years old. At fifteen the precocious scholar had "drawn up a chronicle of the Bible as far as Kings, the nucleus of the work he published in later life." At eighteen he was ready to encounter Fitzsimons, an aggressive pervert to Rome; and when his adversary declined the contest with "a boy," he replied by comparing Fitzsimons to Goliath and himself to David. He was evidently not wanting in self-appreciation nor in good reason for it. It had been thought an honour to Trinity College that his name should be the first on its admission-book. He was ordained deacon and priest on the same day (December, 1601), and was soon afterwards sent with Dr. Challoner to England to buy books for the college library—a journey and errand often repeated.

Dr. Carr has interwoven with the narrative of Ussher's life a careful summary of his work. Much of it relates to controversies that have still a living interest (for instance, Ussher is asked by a Fellow of Trinity for his views "on the extent of Christ's knowledge as a man"—a question recently revived). The King, at Ussher's first presentation at Court, discoursed with him on divers abstruse points of religion, receiving "learned, pertinent answers." Not even then was James satisfied. He told him he must preach before him within a week; and his Majesty, opening a little Bible, chose a text out of Chronicles, "which was very hard bones to pick." Ussher was equal to the task and the text, "extracting abundance of good oil from it"; and the pleased King shortly afterwards nominated him to the Bishopric of Meath—an appointment very popular in Ireland, where even "some of the Papists themselves largely testified their gladness of it."

By royal command Ussher preached before the Commons at the opening of Parliament, February 18, 1620. The sermon gratified the House by its fervent Protestant spirit, and helped to divert the suspicions excited by the King's project of the Spanish match. The Bishop's next notable discourse had not the like good fortune. The Deputy, Lord Grandison, had been recalled in consequence of his vigorous action against the lay impropiators who had plundered the revenues of the Irish Church. The Romanists had joined in the outcry against him; and Ussher felt obliged, in his first sermon before the new Deputy, Lord Falkland, to remind him that he did not "bear the sword in vain," and that it was necessary to restrict somewhat the licence of the malcontents. This discourse occasioned so general an excitement that the Primate, Dr. Hampton, wished Ussher to make a "voluntary retraction of the points offensive," and to spend more time in his diocese. Ussher was too much in request to be able to act on this last suggestion; and his absence from Dublin (which the Archbishop evidently desired) was brought about by a stroke of good service to the Crown. Some "violent Papists of quality" had refused the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; but Ussher, by a speech in the Castle Chamber, so explained the intention and limitations of what was required, that "divers were satisfied that they might lawfully take those oaths." He was rewarded by a royal letter of thanks, and a formal licence of non-residence, that he might the better pursue his studies of Church antiquities.

Preaching before the King, polemics against Rome, the search for scriptural MSS. by his agents in the East, occupied the Bishop during his stay in England. To this period belongs his Answer to a Jesuit. But further preferment was at hand. In January, 1624, the King nominated him to the vacant Primacy, which he was to hold for the next sixteen years. Before he took possession he held a disputation with another Jesuit, Rookwood, and began the wordy war with a statement of doctrine which lasted three days. Rookwood on the next day fled, alleging that he had forgotten all his arguments, and believed his failure due to the just judgment of God on his presumption in disputing "with a man of Ussher's eminence and learning without the permission of his superiors." Rookwood's patron, Lord Mordaunt, became a Protestant; indeed, his conversion had been staked upon the issue.

Beside the normal difficulties in the administration of the Irish Church, Ussher had to deal with those occasioned by the crooked policy of Charles. The Pope's fresh declaration against the oath of supremacy had so excited the "Papists" that the King thought a large army necessary to preserve English interests. To raise it, he offered a relaxation of the penal laws to those Roman Catholics who would subscribe liberally towards its cost. This attempted bargain aroused the indignation of the Established prelates—and also their intolerance. They rightly protested against bartering toleration for money, but went further and denounced toleration itself as a grievous sin, making the granters "accessory to the perdition of the seduced people which perish in the deluge of the Catholic apostasy." It is evident that this utterance of Ussher and his brethren quite accords with that definition of an "orthodox Protestant" which D'Ewes has given us, as one who believes that no Papist can possibly be saved.

The Primate, having made his protest, wished to soothe the irritation it had naturally created, and (after a sermon in which the sin of Judas was duly set forth and rebuked) made a speech on the need of a competent supply to be granted by all subjects without conditions. He urged on the Romanists the danger of invasion by the foreigner, whose sword would make no distinction between Catholic and heretic (as Medina Sidonia said in 1588), and the peril of treachery from the native Irish. He recalled the loyalty of the Catholics to Elizabeth against the Pope and the Spaniards, and reminded the recusants of the forbearance the King had already shown. But "the speech had not its desired effect," as Ussher's chaplain sadly acknowledges; and the speaker betook himself to his private missionary work among the Roman Catholics, discoursing with them with great mildness of the chief tenets of their religion, "by which gentle usage he was strangely successful," as his earliest biographer more strangely remarks.

Ussher's friend Bedell had been appointed to the headship of Trinity, and we have an account of his troubles with unruly, pig-stealing, pale-burning students. His efforts to introduce the Irish language into the Established ritual were persistently thwarted. Ussher thought that the use of Irish would be an obstacle to a closer union with England. In this he followed the policy of an Act of Henry VIII., providing that spiritual promotion should be given "only to such persons as could speak the English tongue, and none other." He pursued this line of discouragement very far, even allowing an aged convert from Romanism, who had assisted Bedell in his Irish translation of the Scriptures, to be haled to prison, and to languish there till he died—Ussher refusing to interfere. Ussher's daily life at Drogheda has been described by Sir William Brereton, who was his guest in 1634. He was somewhat of a recluse, spending all day, except meal-times, in his study. "He was always of an even, cheerful temper, seldom troubled or discomposed" (this last word is here oddly misquoted from Parr as "decomposed")—"a plain, familiar, courteous man."

In 1631 the Archbishop is in London, publishing an enlarged edition of his Religion of the Ancient Irish—a storehouse, as Dr. Carr remarks, of weapons available for the Roman controversy. On his return he had to meet troubles arising from an opposite quarter. The Presbyterian settlers in the north of Ireland had acquired a certain amount of patronage, which they used for the appointment of Presbyterian ministers, who appear to have formally submitted to episcopal ordination in order to retain their livings. Ussher was inclined to acquiesce, till Strafford required him to maintain the Established discipline. The new Lord Deputy laid a stern hand on the abuses of the Irish Church: non-residence, commendams, and fraudulent leases (by bishops) of Church property. The great Earl of Cork had to restore some £40,000; Lord Olanrickard had sold £4000 worth of parsonages. Regardless of the enmity he incurred, Strafford persevered in his raid upon the spoilers. He showed equal determination in a matter wherein he had not the sympathy of the Archbishop. He was bent on bringing the Irish Church to an exact conformity with the English, while Ussher would fain have preserved to the former some of its characteristic differences. In 1615, when Professor of Divinity, he had drawn up for Convocation the Articles of Religion for the Church of Ireland. These reproduced, "almost verbatim," the Calvinistic Lambeth Articles of 1595, which Elizabeth had refused to sanction. They were ratified by the Lord Deputy, but never received the approval of Parliament.

In July, 1634, Convocation assembled in Dublin. It was directed to revise its Articles and Canons with a view to conformity with those of England. When the Lower House began its proceedings by examining and discussing the English Articles, Strafford sent for the chairman, called him Ananias (in allusion to the Puritan in Ben Jonson's Alchemist), and his committee a "pack of Brownists." He insisted on a written "Yes" or "No" by each member. There was but one "No." The enacting Canon, drawn up by Ussher, did not please Strafford, who had prepared one of his own, assuring the Primate that "he better knew the needs of the members, and that they would pass the Canon as he had penned it."

Ussher consoled himself for the mortification by requiring candidates for orders to assent to both sets of Articles. The practice was not questioned; but had any dispute arisen, the consequence to the Archbishop might not have been pleasant so long as Laud was in power. Strafford having had his way about the Articles, allowed Ussher to have his about the Canons. It was merely "a point of honour," he wrote to Laud with some contempt.

"Needs, forsooth, we must be a Church of ourselves, which is utterly lost, unless the Canons here differ, albeit not in substance, yet in some form from yours; and this crotchety put the good man into such an agony as you cannot believe so learned a man should be troubled withal."

Dr. Carr points out that the policy of Laud and Strafford was justified by the event. They recovered for the Irish Church about half the income it enjoyed at its disestablishment. And the imposition of the English Articles—with the gloss of his Majesty's declaration—saved that Church from becoming a mere Puritan sect, a "poor echo of continental Protestantism."

A similar result might have followed, had another project of Ussher's been successful. Though maintaining the claims of episcopacy as the primitive and apostolic form of Church polity, he was yet eager, in the interests of peace, to find some expedient that might conciliate the Presbyterians. He proposed the revival of the "ancient form of government by the united suffrage of the clergy"—in diocesan synod under the bishop, in provincial synod under the archbishop. The latter might be triennial, and might join in a National Council for the hearing of appeal from the inferior synods, and the establishment of ecclesiastical constitutions. In the earlier times of civil trouble, this project seems to have been out of the range of practical politics; but in 1648, during the Newport treaty, Ussher, when consulted by the King, brought it under his notice. Charles was ready to surrender more than Ussher's scheme required, readily adopted the suggestion, and the Presbyterians were at last brought to agree to it. But they were too late: Pride's Purge was at the door. Ussher had left Ireland as far back as March, 1640. His intention to return was never fulfilled. He resided in Oxford (at Christ Church), to pursue his studies and avoid the "heats and differences" arising in the Short Parliament. But he went back to London (where he had been well received by the King on his arrival), in the hope that he might "by preaching and writing" retain the Long Parliament "in loyalty and obedience to their prince," though his endeavours (his chaplain tells us) "did not meet with that success he always desired."

Evil times were coming on the Archbishop. For a while he stood his ground, and could even protect Bramhall, whom the Irish Parliament was harrying. But his rents were withheld and his property plundered. The revenues of Carlisle (assigned to him by the King as some compensation for his losses) were sequestered by Parliament. His moderate counsels were called Papistical, and Prynne attacked him with a venomous rancour. He fled from Oxford to Bristol, to Cardiff—where he resumed his literary labours and had a passing glimpse of the King, preaching before him August 4, 1645. Compelled again to shift his quarters, he accepted Lady Stradling's invitation to St. Donat's; but on the way he was attacked by the wild Welsh, and lost much of his collections "that I have been gathering together above these twenty years."

After a severe illness, and when in danger of imprisonment, he was offered the hospitality of another devout matron—the Dowager Countess of Peterborough—at her house in London. Three years before, he had refused to join the Westminster Assembly, and the Commons in revenge had seized his library. The Court of Examiners now summoned Ussher before them, but were content to threaten him with the imposition of the "negative oath." He retired to his hostess's seat at Reigate until his health was re-established; and then, by the influence of Hale—and possibly of Selden—he was induced to accept the post of Lecturer at Lincoln's Inn, where Evelyn was among his hearers. It was certainly a striking testimony to his worth that he should have been allowed to hold the office for eight years (when he resigned on account of his increasing infirmities), and that Parliament should have voted him £400 a year—a grant renewed by Cromwell. The value of the gift would have been greater had it been regularly paid.

This favour was not earned by any base compliance. Ussher made no secret of his opinion that the Commons had "dealt very injuriously with the King." He never recognised the legality of Cromwell's rule, and refused to obey his summons to attend him. That was in 1649, after the King's execution—an event partly witnessed by the Primate from the roof of Lady Peterborough's house. (By the way, the date is wrongly given, and Laud's death-day is assigned to Stafford at p. 355.) In 1654, he was prevailed on to intercede with the Protector for the episcopal clergy. Cromwell was under the hands of his surgeon, and pointing to the boil on his breast, remarked to Ussher, "If this core were out, I should soon be well." The reply was, "I doubt the core lies deeper: there is a core in the heart which must be taken out, or else it will not be well." "Ah," said Cromwell, seemingly unconcerned, "so there is indeed," and sighed. The Protector having dexterously taken the literal meaning of the Archbishop's words, requited them with the refusal of his petition. Ussher, when he could with safety, broke forth into indignation, and foretold the return of the King. "Though I shall not live to see it, you may," he told his chaplain; and added the comment, "Some men have guts but no bowels."

He returned to languish at Reigate, to pursue with failing sight and lessening strength his darling studies. On his last birthday (January 4, 1656) he wrote: "Now aged seventy-five years: my years are full"; and below, in large letters, "Resignation." In February Dr. Parr, his chaplain and biographer, preached before him for the last time. On March 20 he went to visit a sick lady and prepare her for death; and that night, after supper, he was himself attacked with pleurisy, of which he died a little after one next day. The last words he was heard to utter were a prayer for forgiveness, "specially for his sins of omission."

Cromwell ordered him a public funeral in Westminster Abbey. Dr. Parr points out the "intriguing subtilty" of the Protector, who, "by an expense of £200 out of the deodands in his almoner's hands, put those he accounted his enemies to treble that charge," and yet "reaped all the glory" of that solemn funeral. On this occasion only during all the period of the Commonwealth was the Burial Service read in the Abbey.

If, on laying down this careful tribute to Ussher's memory, we feel that we have been made acquainted with the Archbishop's achievements rather than with his character, we are not disposed to blame the author. One indication given us by Dr. Parr may account for this result. It appears that in his youth Ussher had gathered out of certain unwary passages in books that afflictions "were a necessary mark of a child of God; which wrought upon him so much that he earnestly prayed God to deal with him in that way—and he had his request, and this through the whole course of his life." So it was his fate to see the world go against all he most loved and revered, with no power to influence or hinder. Thus his courage turned to passive endurance. His diocese gave him occupation less congenial than his study, and he quitted it for ever even before the outbreak of civil war. It may well have been that his true vocation was to wield, not the pastoral staff, but the pen; his true province, as a scholar of European reputation, the spacious fields of Church doctrine and Church history.

TWO BOOKS ON CHITRAL.

The Relief of Chitral. By Captains George and Frank Younghusband. (Macmillans.)

The Chitral Campaign. By H. C. Thomson. (Heinemann.)

THESE two modest, well-written volumes give us exactly what we wanted—details of the campaign, a glimpse of the country, and light on the dark corners of the Blue Book.

Separated only by Wakhan from the Russian sphere of influence, Chitral commands the southern openings of Iekamun and Baroghil, the two easy passes across the break in the great mountain-barrier of the Hindu Kush, leading up to the Pamir Steppes. And the line of policy, "steadily and consistently carried out by successive Viceroy and Secretaries of State," has been

"to control the external affairs of Chitral in a direction friendly to our interests; to secure an effective guardianship over its northern passes; and to keep watch on what goes on beyond those passes."

From the first, this little state, not much larger than Wales, and with a population of some 70,000 or 80,000 hardy, laughter-loving mountaineers, has shown itself too weak and unstable to stand alone. In 1878, after much trimming between Kabul and Kashmir, the Great Mehtar, Amán-ul-Mulk, negotiated, under the auspices of Lord Lytton, a treaty with the Raja of Kashmir, by which he agreed to accept a subsidy, and, in acknowledgment of his paramount power, to send an annual nazrana of five horses, four hawks, and five hounds. In the same year a British Agency was established at Gilgit, and we were thus first brought into touch with the Mehtars of Chitral. Since 1889, they have received a subsidy from the government of India, as well as from Kashmir.

The Chitral court has been a shambles. It was open to any legitimate descendant of a former occupant, provided that the claimant's father had himself sat on it; the direct step to it was the assassination of any possible rival. Amán-ul-Mulk died in 1892—the Chitralis say by poison. His younger son, Afzul-ul-Mulk, who then seized the throne, was forthwith murdered by his uncle Shér Afzul. As promptly Shér Afzul was driven into exile by Amán-ul-Mulk's elder son, Nizam-ul-Mulk. And last New Year's Day Nizam-ul-Mulk was in his turn assassinated by his half-brother, Amir-ul-Mulk. The process was not peculiar to Chitral. The accession of Umra Khan to the masnad of Jandol is graphically described by Mr. Thomson. Disguised in woman's dress, Umra Khan had shot down his elder brother and taken refuge in the fort. After some days' confusion,

"the old queen stood out upon the wall and addressed the people: 'O, men of Jandol,' she said, 'why are you troubled? Is it not enough for you that one of my sons shall reign over you? Surely it is for them to decide among themselves which it shall be. That is no concern of yours.'"

Then Umra Khan bound on the pugari, and became the accepted ruler of Jandol. An Afghan proverb runs: "Kings sit upon an ant-heap."

Meanwhile, at the invitation of its Mehtars, Political officers had been sent to Chitral—among them Captain Frank Younghusband. On the murder of Nizam-ul-Mulk, Lieutenant Gurdon, supported only by an escort of eight Sikhs, had, with great tact and with his life in his hand, maintained his position at the short-lived court of the usurper Amir-ul-Mulk. On February 1 the Agent, Surgeon-Major (now Sir George) Robertson, entered Chitral. The situation had become critical. Umra Khan, the bold chieftain of Jandol, took the frontier fortress, Kila Drosh, and was aiming at the sovereignty of Chitral itself. He was joined by Shír Afzul, who had escaped from exile in Afghanistan; and Mr. Robertson was insolently bidden to quit. His last communication with the government of India was dated March 1; on the 2nd the siege began.

Lord Elgin and his advisers rose to the occasion. So promptly were measures taken, and so admirably were they carried out, that Captain Younghusband seems justified in saying that

"in one month from the day on which the mobilisation of the relief force was ordered, the main object of the campaign was obtained: the whole of the enemy's numerous and ubiquitous force was dispersed, and every one of the important chiefs was a prisoner in our hands, or in those of our ally, the Amir."

Both books are full of moving accidents by flood and field; each has its photographs and map; and the one is only put down to take up the other. To them must be left the description of the varied and stirring incidents of the campaign: the beleaguered little garrison without a gun, the ill-omened reconnaissance, the heroism of Whitechurch and the death of Baird, the hoisting of the Union Jack, the firing of the gun-tower, Harley's final sortie, and the relief; the advance of General Low past positions deemed to be impregnable and across four mountain ranges and three considerable rivers, the storming of the Malakand Pass, the death of Baitye, and the lifting of the curtain behind which the rich recesses of the Swāt Valley had so long lain hid; the magnificent march of Borradaile and Colonel Kelly over the snowbound heights of the Sandur Pass, and the masterly carrying of the serried sangurs at Chokawalat and Nisa Gol. The Karogh disaster and the horrors of its caves, the historic game of Polo and the adventures of Edwardes and Fowler, will be read eagerly.

In no previous campaign had the resources of our Indian Empire stood out in such bold relief. A rapid mobilisation is the earnest of success; the new scheme was on its trial. The crux was transport. Ordinary carriage was altogether useless; but in less than a fortnight 28,000 pack-animals—camels, mules, bullocks, donkeys, ponies—had been assembled at Nowshera, all required for the First Division alone. On May 2, 35,000 animals were at work. Within forty-eight hours from the time they were ordered on service, the Imperial Transport Trains volunteered by the Rajas of Gwalior and Jaipur were on their march. They proved of the greatest value; their efficiency was beyond all praise. Throughout India (so runs the official despatch) chiefs, noblemen, and gentlemen of every station and degree came forward to render service and prove their devotion—a widespread evidence of earnest and vigilant loyalty.

It is a far cry from Balaklava to Chitral; but "Ninety-third; Ninety-third! Damn all that eagerness," was caught up in stern old Goor-mukh Singh's "To hospital you're ordered, and in hospital you'll stay," when, in lust of battle, his Sikhs would leave their stretchers. Brave hearts up there were beating high, and the soldier warms in telling us of the courage of the foe—of the leader with the red and white flag charging boldly down the Malakand upon the Scottish Borderers, wounded again and again, but up and on, till, all his followers shot down, he falls, dead at last, at the very forefront of our line; or of the drummer, dropping from the hut-roof only to dress his wounds, then standing out once more against the sky-line, drumming on, till he lies stark dead beneath the cliff, with his drum still round his neck, and his hands still raised to strike it. It was no coward's cry: "We are ready for you in the open with talwars; but we can't stand your devil-guns." Raw Hunza levies form in line across the ice-cold mountain stream, in spate breast high, to catch laden coolies as they are swept down below the ford. The Kashmir Rifles outvie the Sikh Pioneers in carrying the mountain guns over the Sandur Pass, when the mules, floundering up to their bellies in the snow, can no longer get along. There is no need to pick and choose. Open almost where we will, we come across some fresh and gallant deed; and this without the "stiffening of British troops."

And the end of it—only two alternatives remained: either our position in Chitral must at all hazards be maintained, or all attempts to retain any control over its affairs must be abandoned. There was no middle course. But to abandon Chitral was to abandon our watch on its passes; to rob the Gilgit Agency of more than half its value, without much diminishing its cost; to go back on the consistent policy of years; to break faith with the Raja of Kashmir, and not only to throw the whole country into confusion, but to mock the loyalty and devotion so recently displayed, and to damage irremediably our prestige—the mainspring of our rule in India. The telegram of June 13 ran thus:

"No military force or European agency shall be kept at Chitral. Chitral shall not be fortified; no road shall be made between Peshawur and Chitral. All positions beyond our frontier now held in consequence of the relief operations should be evacuated as soon as circumstances allow."

One word would have done as well as forty. At that word "Scuttle" a shiver would have run through India—but other counsels have prevailed. The young Mehtar, Sujah-ul-Mulk, is now under our guardianship. The all-important road from Chitral to Peshawur is to run along the left bank of the Panjkora river, so that we have to deal only with our ally the Khan of Dir and with the now friendly Khans of Swat; for directly this luxuriant valley was in our hands the people began to show a friendly feeling:

"Hae tibi erunt artes; pacisque imponere morem, Parcere subjectis, et de bellare superbos."

H. B. HARRINGTON.

Four English Humorists of the Nineteenth Century. Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution in January and February, 1895. By William Samuel Lilly. (John Murray.)

"The title of these Lectures, as I need hardly say, has been suggested to me by Thackeray." So remarks Mr. Lilly; and it is interesting, and, in a sense—not a hostile sense—almost amusing, to note how different is the manner in which he treats his humorists—Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, and Carlyle—from the manner in which Thackeray treated the English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century. Thus, for instance, in dealing with Thackeray himself, Mr. Lilly prefaces his criticism by a disquisition—a very just one—on the relation of the novelist's art to ethics, and of ethics to psychology, and on the erroneous opinion that psychology is a subordinate department of biology. Think of Thackeray thus introducing an essay on Goldsmith or Sterne or Fielding! And the curiously interesting point is, that in the lecture thus prefaced Thackeray is differentiated from his brother humorists as being pre-eminently the "philosopher."

For that Thackeray was not a philosopher in any ordinary sense of the term seems to me, I confess—all paradox apart—to be quite clear. His power of placing concrete fact before his readers is admirable; and it is noteworthy how habitually, when he is dissertating, his argument runs to a concrete illustration. But for abstract systematic thought he certainly had no liking, nor, so far as appears, any aptitude. Mr. Lilly, of course, knows this as well as I do. "I question," he says, "whether he [Thackeray] had ever looked into a book of metaphysics; whether he would have even understood the terms we use in discussing metaphysical questions." But a philosopher who has never studied his subject, and is quite ignorant of its terminology, is at least a philosopher of a very unusual type. Not so, answers Mr. Lilly; Thackeray

"was a philosopher in the wide sense indicated by Plato in a famous passage of the fifth book of the Republic—the sense of a genuine lover of wisdom, of an eager student of real existence; and his philosophy of life—Lebensphilosophie—comes into special prominence in all his writings, and is his distinguishing characteristic."

He was a philosopher because "he knew well that human existence rests upon elementary moralities, upon primary ethical verities."

But—Mr. Lilly will forgive me for asking the question—is there not in all this some little want of the historic sense? Thackeray—like Dickens, like Scott, like Jane Austen—belonged to a generation which, fortunately perhaps for itself, had not yet generally begun to question the "moralities" and "verities." During the first half of this century Christianity, the Christian system of ethics, the framework of society, were accepted generally—accepted by all save a few thinkers who were mostly afraid, for social and other reasons, to express their real sentiments. Thackeray was not a philosopher because he accepted without question the beliefs of his time, however excellent, or even because he now and again took them as texts for the most admirable discourse. The title belongs rather to those who, after question, have reached some further—though by no means necessarily better—stage of denial, doubt, affirmation, or re-affirmation.

It belongs, for example, far rather to George Eliot than to Thackeray. George Eliot, according to Mr. Lilly's classification, is the "humorist as poet." She is not, be it understood, a poet on the strength of her poetry, which, as Mr. Lilly most justly estimates, is not of high order. She is a poet because she has the faculties of observation and description, and sensibility and reflection, and imagination and fancy, and judgment: because she expresses for us "the universal element in human life." All this, again, seems to me, I own, a little paradoxical. Balzac's possession of the faculties in question could scarcely be disputed, and yet his name is not to be found in any French poetical anthology. But whatever George Eliot's claims to poetic rank, she was undeniably a philosopher. Her beliefs had been arrived at by due course of reasoning, and were definite and clear. She, at least, would have found no difficulty in understanding the terms used in metaphysical discussion. That she was not a Positivist of purest orthodoxy, nor practised with solemnity the rites of that persuasion, may be conceded to Mr. Lilly, as also that, in her first and better books at least, "her tone," to use Lewes's words, "was throughout sympathetic with religious beliefs," and "not at all antagonistic to them." But it is useless to attempt to deny that her creed was in essentials the Positivist creed; and one of the main interests of her writings, to me at least, is the kind of half-terror they evince of what Newman has well called "the wild living intellect of man," of the power of the pure reason as an ethical solvent, and her passionate desire to find some help, amid the decay of ancient faiths, towards a higher life than that of mere Epicureanism.

This earnestness of ethical purpose appeals most strongly to Mr. Lilly, who is himself, above all, a philosopher and a moralist. Indeed, in these lectures of his, the humour of the four humorists named occupies a very secondary and subordinate place, has a tendency to fade altogether out of view. It is their teaching, the message they had for mankind, the relation of their essential doctrines to what he holds to be true, that really interests him. The humorist as teacher is really his subject. And it is probably from a kind of natural affinity that he is so much more successful, more moved to sympathetic insight, when dealing with George Eliot and Carlyle, than in dealing with humorists so distinctly humorous as Thackeray and Dickens—the lecture on Dickens being distinctly the least felicitous. One rather wonders what he would make of a humorist who had nothing of the preacher in him, like Charles Lamb.

But this is by the way; and anything in the above that may seem like carping must not be taken for more than is meant. Mr. Lilly's lectures are fresh, suggestive, stimulating. Could one wish for more when such well-worn themes are under discussion?

FRANK T. MARZIALS.

On the Track of the Mail-Couch. By F. E. Baines, C.B. (Bentley.)

THE half-title of this new volume by Mr. Baines, a gentleman long and favourably known to most of us in connexion with the administration of the Post Office, conveys but little information as to its contents. The subsequent words are far more explicit. They give the assurance that it is "a volume of reminiscences, personal and other—" wise," and even this expression does not fully set out the whole of the details contained within its covers. The work is in the main one of autobiography, and the "very last official efforts" of Mr. Baines are duly imparted to the reader. The "stirring sight of a brilliantly lighted, well-horsed Royal Mail parcel-coach rolling swiftly along the York-road on its way to Hatfield and Bedford," which is visible to the traveller who plants himself "at Hadley Highstone at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock at night"—Mr. Baines is as precise in his statement, though his soul does delight in adjectives, as an emeritus-official should be—will go down to remote ages as his last achievement at St. Martin's-le-Grand. But even the retirement of the distinguished head of a department does not make the wheels of business stand still in a Government office; and many of the incidents of official life since he closed his active connexion with his old friends, which are revealed to us by his pen, must have been communicated to him by some of the workers whom he left behind in harness.

Our chronicler is a kindly man. Nothing is here set down in malice; and if any of the august personages in the Post Office should ever require an extenuating circumstance to be mentioned in mitigation of a blunder they may rely on obtaining it from Mr. Baines. There is not a chapter in his book that can be described as dull. Not all the facts which he mentions are of equal value, and some of them, perchance, are of no value at all; but the volume is crammed with information, and the customer of Mudie's who opens it will not find himself willing to abandon the pleasure of reading it. Mr. Baines appears occasionally as a type of the writer who, from ignorance of the ordinary sources of information, magnifies the labour of obtaining an explanation for some not very obscure point of antiquarian history. Many of the coach-roads on the northern side of the Thames were measured from the site of Hioke's Hall, and he appears to have spent some time in investigating the position of this building. A glance at the familiar pages of Peter Cunningham's delightful work on London would have settled the point at once. The apple-tree on the roof of the abbey church at Romsey disappeared, he thinks, "some time in the fifties"; but the account of the town in Murray's Handbook to Hampshire gives the date of its removal as about 1820, when it was cut down under the apprehension that it endangered the tower. Mr. Baines states that the stone, near the inn at Stoney Cross, in the New Forest, which marked the position of the oak-tree from which the arrow of Tyrrell glanced and killed William Rufus, has vanished. It was originally erected in 1745, and nearly a century later was renewed by Sturges-Bourne, the friend of Canning. Why or how it has been removed the guardians of the Forest can perhaps explain. Of the inn itself Mr. Baines makes loving mention; but he omits to state—a curious omission in an official of the Post Office—that it was a favourite resort of the most popular Postmaster-General that ever filled that office, the late Henry Fawcett.

The inns of England are a favourite topic with Mr. Baines. He has probably seen the inside of as many hotels as any man in England, barring a commercial traveller. It would almost be possible, from his mention of them in these pages, to make a complete itinerary of his movements during the last half century. North or South of England he seems to revel in them; and when his recollections carry him to the West of England, his affection for his old hostleries fairly runs riot. About a page is occupied with the charms of the "Green Bank" at Falmouth, and with a succinct biography of the "official who filled the useful post of boots." The main roads in the United Kingdom along which Mr. Baines has sped in his investigations form frequently the subject of an expressive eulogy. He quotes from the pages of Lord Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors a judgment of Lord Erskine referring to the comparative merits of Paterson and Cary, the authors of the two principal works on roads; but I cannot refrain from suspecting that the Chancellor's memory had transposed their names, and that Cary was the plagiarist from Paterson, as the latter's work was much the earlier of the two in date.

Mr. Baines gives a brief biography of Colonel Maberly, for many years Secretary of the Post Office, which may be compared with the notice of that official in the amusing recollections of Edmund Yates. Maberly's name has now dropped out of recollection, but he was long a Member of Parliament and an official at the War Office and the Post Office. With regard to him, as with everybody else, the historian dwells on the good points of his character. The affection of Mr. Baines for his old department, and his desire for its further development, have not grown cold since his withdrawal into private life. He anticipates a great extension of telephonic communication from one village to another, and concludes his labours with a chapter, quaintly entitled "A Future for the Glebe," in which he dilates on this topic.

The pages of Mr. Baines will leave a pleasant memory in the mind of every one who peruses them. They will also revive the recollection of his previous volumes on the Post Office.

MR. MARION CRAWFORD does not desert the Eternal City; and, apart from his intimate acquaintance with life in the Rome of Pio Nono, the air of "Cosmopolis" must be eminently suited to a writer for whom questions of race have so great a fascination. His last Roman novel is a trilogy, conceived in a spirit which recalls superficially the Greek tragic poets. A sort of Atê is upon the three women of the house of Braccio, who are the heroines of the three parts of this tragedy: upon Sister Maria Addolorata, a Carmelite nun at Subiaco, who breaks her vow for love of the Scottish doctor, Angus Dalrymple; upon their daughter Gloria, who twenty years later marries unhappily, leaves her husband, tires of her lover, and poisons herself to escape from a life of hopeless remorse; and upon Donna Francesca Campodonico, the patroness and the blameless friend of Gloria's husband, the artist Angelo Reanda. The interest of the first part of the story—certainly the weakest—lies almost wholly in the ingenuity of a rather sensational plot. But the character of Gloria, which is developed in the second, is a masterly conception. She is drawn as a woman equally self-conscious and emotional, craving a constant change of sensations, and able to evoke, artificially, sensations which are not the less truly felt for being short-lived. It is not a common type, but it is a genuine one; and the only fault to be found with Mr. Crawford's presentment is that his psychology is a little too explicit. He often demonstrates where it would be enough to draw, and points to the skeleton behind the portrait. Angus Dalrymple is excellently conceived; and so is Donna Francesca, and so is Reanda. Gloria's lover, Paul Griggs (the American journalist whom Mr. Crawford's readers already know), is not altogether a satisfactory creation. There is a fanciful mysticism about his "double personality," as the idea is developed in the last part of the story; and his muscular pre-eminence is too constantly insisted on. Mr. Crawford pays perhaps an excessive adoration to physical qualities; and now and then in this connexion he becomes grotesque, as when he says of Angus Dalrymple that Maria "could feel his breath through her veil when he spoke again. It was vital and fierce, like the breathing of a powerful wild beast." Some peasants, a country doctor, and an Abbess pour rire supply a not too successful comic element. Mr. Crawford makes his peasants funny by means of a time-honoured plan that we think unworthy of him: he interlards their talk with phrases literally translated from the Italian—for fear we should mistake them for Englishmen. Thus, a man is said to wish a girl well, not in the sense that the expression bears in English, but in the special, idiomatic sense of voler bene—"to be in love with" a person; and Dalrymple is advised, somewhere, to "make love with a nun, if it goes, Signore"! These are trivial blemishes. Casa Braccio is well worth reading: the story is extremely interesting and it is written in an agreeable and correct style, which only here and there runs to diffuseness and over-emphasis. It is its author's twenty-fifth novel, and there is not a sign of carelessness or exhaustion about it. Mr. Marion Crawford is a novelist whom one should be thankful for: mature and conscientious, he stands apart from the crowd of mere amateurs, and, in Paul Griggs's words, he has "built up a superiority for himself."

Mr. Brander Matthews's novel of New York life is a disappointing book, because he has chosen an atmosphere and a subject offering great opportunities and has not done them justice. Ezra Pierce is a Wall-street financier, for whom ordinary morality and professional morality are essentially different things. But he is no hypocrite, and hardly suspects the discrepancy, while his wife and son worship him blindly, admiring the religious and charitable zeal with which he bestows on the poor much of the wealth he has stolen from the public. Gradually young Winslow comes to doubt his father's integrity: he judges him by the simple standard of right and wrong which he has learnt from his Puritan mother, and concludes that Ezra is not consistently moral, that, consequently, morality cannot possibly matter, and that he himself may do as he likes. This is a sort of logic which could recommend itself only to one who, having long been a villain by habit, is anxious to be a villain on principle; but, as Mr. Matthews has drawn Winslow, this exceptionally weak and rather stupid young man leaps at a bound from honest doubt to hardened cynicism. Perhaps we ought to expect that the son of a man who has made millions by something like fraud should turn out ill; but even if one believes, with the author, that "there is always a clear track and a down-grade on the railroad to ruin, and the engineer never whistles back to put on the brakes," the precipitancy of Winslow's course from bad to worse must appear amazing, and the catholicity of his taste in delinquencies at least remarkable. Mr. Matthews is, in detail, a good observer, though there are scenes in His Father's Son which lack verisimilitude—notably, the reception of Winslow's promised wife in his father's house. Ezra himself is well drawn; so are Mrs. Pierce and the Wall-street clerks. The fraudulent transactions, which fill a large space in the book, are very likely authentically described, but they are certainly dull; and, after Balzac, no one believes that finance need be dull even for readers who are not normally interested in "bears" and "corners." The final catastrophe is cleverly painted, but it is a pity we should be left wondering what has actually happened.

A third American book, The Countess Bettina, has nothing good about it except the cover. The adventures of the Countess Bettina of Périgord and the person who champions her and tells the story might amuse someone; but we can conscientiously recommend them only to an earnest collector of grammatical solecisms who is not afraid of work. We acquit the author of all intention to be disrespectful in choosing to connect his characters with the historical, and by no means extinct, names of Périgord (or, rather, Périgord), Vauluse, and Este. But one cannot be too careful in that sort of society; and it might have been worth while to learn that the Prince of Monaco is not "His Excellency," and that the "Empress Eugénie of Montijo" is not the title of the ex-Empress of the French.

Miss Dougall's new story is very readable, and its quiet and diverting plot somehow suggests Jane Austen. There is, we fancy, a little uncertainty about the real character of the West-country heiress, Alice Bolitho; but the young man expected to marry her, and her neighbour the squire, are well and carefully drawn, and only sanguine observers will think Mrs. Ross's amiable inanity exaggerated. We should like to enter our protest against the way in which the story ends. Miss Dougall must have got the notion that finality is inartistic. Of course, catastrophes are unnecessary; but to suggest critical questions and leave them unanswered is to reduce a romance to the level of an anecdote. For, after all, does Harvey marry Amy Ross? does Alice marry the squire? and does the squire reconcile her to orthodoxy?—a comfortable issue which is at least hinted at. The author writes smoothly; but she has a most irritating trick of interrupting dialogue with descriptive adverbs, unsupported by any other part of speech. There is some excellent landscape in this book; and the narrative has, among other merits, the considerable merit of rapidity.

Another West-country novel, The Romance of his Picture, has an atmosphere with which artists of the Newlyn school have made most of us familiar. Mr. Pickering's style is undistinguished, and his studio "shop" irrelevant; but the story of the young lady who made pocket-money by sitting to an artist as a peasant girl is a rather amusing one.

His Last Card is a story with plenty of plot, and those who have read a great many very sophisticated books will probably find it "refreshing." It is throughout a conflict of the angelic with the infernal; and the author displays a good deal of the smiling cynicism of children who imagine atrocities from their ignorance of wrong. The love-scenes are properly managed; and the reconciliation of the heroine and her husband under the auspices of their grandchild is prettily imagined.

Old Maids and Young is a very lively and pleasing tale, happily conceived and maturely told. Most of the characters in the early chapters are children, and the charm with which the author treats child-life is best indicated by an epithet very lavishly misapplied in general—the critic's word-of-all-work, "fresh." Miss D'Esterre-Keeling does not deal in prodigies, she does not gush, and she does not make children lisp when they are old enough to speak plainly. Roths and Rowan and Bride are charmingly portrayed; and when they reappear, after a lapse of years, as young man and maidens, we recognise them—which is saying a good deal. The old maids, Miss Onora and Miss Mariabella, are fascinating studies; in them, as well as in most of her characters, the author has both created individuals and realised types. For the sake of impartiality, let us say that there are too many "asides" for our taste; when plain narrative, plain dialogue, and plain description are adequate, a running commentary, full of apophthegms and familiarities and rather ambitious allusions, can only be regarded as an interruption. And Miss D'Esterre-Keeling writes so well that it is a pity she has the common, but erroneous, notion that the English language is enriched by the double preposition "on to."

In Miss Dora Russell's novel, A Man's Privilege, an heiress marries the wrong man because the right man hesitates to run the risk of being thought a fortune-hunter, and the wrong man takes care he shall be thought something worse. The wrong man is a murderer and several other criminals in one; but he ends by suicide, and the heroine inevitably remarries. There is no pretence to literary merit here; but the book is very exciting and ought to be read in the train.

Crucifix is a translation which reads like a third-rate original: that is to say, it is no doubt an adequate English version of a French book not worth translating. It is in the form of a diary kept by a sentimental and candid young woman, whose mother is afflicted with leprosy and who expects to become a leper herself.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

William Shakspeare. By Barrett Wendell. (Dent.) This study of Shakspeare's development as an artist is based upon a series of lectures delivered at Harvard College. It must be counted unto Mr. Wendell for righteousness that he is not content to furbish up the traditional commonplaces of criticism. He makes a distinct effort throughout to see for himself, and to deliver an opinion unobscured by too much of the shadow of authority. As a result the book reads freshly. It is full of new points of view, and of judgments which, however much you disagree with them, at least suggest new lines of speculation. On the other hand, the constant desire to say something original and striking frequently leads Mr. Wendell to venture upon uncomfortably paradoxical ground. There is not a little startling in the statement that "Hamlet" betrays "a marked tendency to insanity" in the stock to which its author belonged: that the mind which wrote it had "the diseased activity, without the aberration of mania." Most of Mr. Wendell's truths are only half-truths. It is only half true that we must put ourselves in the position of an Elizabethan audience before we can understand Shakspeare, if by this is meant that Shakspeare in his writing never transcends the average Elizabethan point of view; and it is only half true that Shakspeare's plays are the outcome rather of emotional moods than of deliberate efforts of thought. Surely Shakspeare was philosopher as well as poet. Doubtless the mood gave the first artistic impulse; but doubtless also this impulse grew, before the play was far advanced, into a conscious structure of thought. On the whole, Mr. Wendell's book savours rather of the smartness characteristic of the country from which it comes than of the sanity and breadth of view which are so essential to the finer criticism.

"THE ARCADEY LIBRARY."—Round about a Brighton Coach Office. By Maude Egerton King. (John Lane.) In the form of recollections of a boyhood passed at Brighton seventy and odd years ago, Mrs. King has produced an altogether fascinating little volume. They are a "bundle of true stories" told by the son of a Brighton coachmaster, whose native place was then a small fishing town—stretching no farther than Russell-street to the west and the Old Steine to the east—whither great people from London came occasionally for a few weeks of fresh air and jolly rustication. Successive episodes bring us acquainted with all the inmates of the coach-office and many of their friends; and it is hard to say whether the author's quaint and leisurely manner of telling the stories or her charming sketches of character deserve greater praise. The most excellent things in the book, perhaps, are the chapter called "A Day of Punishment" and the portraits of Mr. Sprightly, the dissipated but faithful odd-man, and of the coachmaster himself, who is surely of kin to Mr. Peggotty in David Copperfield, and not unworthy the affinity. The volume is admirably illustrated by Miss Lucy Kemp Welch.

A Set of Rogues: namely Christopher Sutton, John Dawson, the Señor Don Sanchez del Castillo de Castelaña, and Moll Dawson. Their Wicked Conspiracy and a True Account of their Travels and Adventures. By Frank Barrett. (Innes.) Mr. Frank Barrett has accomplished the difficult feat of writing a seventeenth century "picaresque" story, very fairly imitating the manner of the famous models of that species of composition, but without a trace of anything that would make it unsuitable reading for young people. There is no reason to find fault with the moral: one of the conspirators does in the end arrive at the enjoyment of wealth and happiness; but it is only after deep repentance and expiation for misdeeds that were rather her misfortune than her fault. We have little doubt that the author could, if he chose to take the needful pains, write an excellent historical romance. It would, by the way, have been better if he had avoided giving to his Spaniard a quite impossible name.

The Tyrants of Kool-Sim. By J. Maclaren Cobban. Illustrated by J. Brewster Fisher. (Henry.) There is a good deal of cleverness in this story, which has a distinct resemblance to some of the earlier writings of Mr. Grant Allen. Mr. Cobban, however, carries his wilful disregard of probability to the verge of absurdity. Boy readers are not very severely critical on this score, especially when a tale is so full as this is of thrilling and novel adventures; but we fancy even they will regard some of the incidents a little disdainfully. The book tells how two schoolboys manage to elude the vigilance of their elders, and make their way to Marseilles, in order to attach themselves to an expedition for the discovery and rescue of the uncle of one of them, who is believed to be a captive in North Africa. The search party consists of a famous explorer, Captain Betterton, and the missing man's sister, "Miss Topsy," and her companion. The boys and the ladies pass unharmed through terrific adventures; and the lost uncle is discovered as the "Sun-god" of the pygmies of Kool-Sim, having been compelled to assume that character in order to save his life. The pygmies are, it seems, a highly civilised race, cruelly oppressed by a detestable brood of tyrants, whose blood is so saturated with venom that an arrow-head touched with it causes certain and agonising death! The rescued "Sun-god" aids his deliverers in the emancipation of the people from this terrible rule, and then goes back to his dark-skinned wife and children in Algeria, while "Miss Topsy" returns home to marry the heroic Captain Betterton.

Leaves from a Middy's Log. By Arthur Lee Knight. (Nelson.) This is a capitally told story of exciting adventure. After a victorious struggle with the mutinous crew of a merchant vessel on the coast of Cuba, the "middy" and his companions take part in an expedition into the interior in pursuit of the fugitives. Here they are captured by a band of ruffians, carried on board a pirate ship, and eventually imprisoned in a cave on a desolate island. In the confusion caused by a volcanic eruption they make their escape, are chased by blood-hounds, and after a desperate fight succeed in getting clear of their pursuers, and find themselves in the neighbourhood of their own ship.

After Sedgemoor: being the History and Adventures of Clement Noel in the Days of King James the Second. By Edgar Pickering. (Hutchinson.) This is the story of a youth who, for a very indirect connexion with Monmouth's rebellion, is sentenced by Jeffreys to be sold into slavery in the West Indies. After a long series of surprising adventures he finds his way back to England, enriched by a precious find of jewels, just in time to witness the retribution which befel the wicked judge. Mr. Pickering attempts for a few pages an archaism of style suitable to the period of the supposed narrator, but soon relapses into very modern English. The book, however, is interesting and not badly written.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WITH the New Year's honours comes the official announcement that "Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint Alfred Austin, Esq., to be Poet Laureate to Her Majesty." It will be remembered that, about six years ago, Mr. William Watson paid Mr. Austin the compliment of editing a selection of his poems, under the title of English Lyrics.

The date fixed for the publication of Mr. E. S. Purcell's Life of Cardinal Manning is Friday next, January 10. It will be in two volumes, with portraits.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL will publish immediately the Autobiography of the late Admiral Lord Clarence Paget, who died last year. It includes diaries of his service in the Baltic, the Black Sea, and the Mediterranean; and has been edited by his nephew, Sir Arthur Otway, formerly well known as a Liberal politician. It will be in one volume, with several portraits and other illustrations.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish during January a History of the Postal Packet Service during the French War, from 1793 to 1815, written by Mr. Arthur H. Norman, mainly from official records.

THE next volume in the series of "Heroes of the Nations" will be Joan of Arc, by Mrs. Oliphant, who has, we understand, interested herself in the subject for some years past.

THE Rev. H. R. Haweis is preparing an account of his travels through America, New Zealand, Tasmania, and Ceylon during the three years 1883, 1893, 1895. It will be published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus, in two volumes, under the title of Talk and Travel.

MESSRS. PATRICK GEDDES & COLLEAGUES will publish shortly, through the Edinburgh Riverside Press, Lyra Celtica: an anthology of representative Celtic poetry, from the ancient Irish, Alban-Gaelic, Breton, and Gynric bards, down to the youngest Scottish and Irish writers of to-day, edited by Mrs. William Sharp.

THE next volume of "Chapman's Story Series of Incident, Action, and Adventure," to be published in the course of January, will be The White Feather, by Mr. Oswald Crawford, with a frontispiece by Mr. Adolph Birk-enruth.

MR. GISSING's new book, The Paying Guest, which is a new departure from his usual style, will be published on Monday next, as a volume in Cassell's "Pocket Library." Originally intended for issue in December, it was postponed in order that simultaneous publication in the United States might be arranged.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS announce for early publication The Crime of the Century, by Mr. E. Ottolengui, an American writer of detective stories, whose work has attracted notice in at least one English magazine.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN announces the second edition of a pseudonymous little book published some months ago under the title of Wilmot's Child, by "Atey Nine." The name of the author is now disclosed as Dr. Joseph Parker, of the City Temple.

THE University of Dublin has conferred the degree of Doctor of Divinity upon the Rev. W. F. Cobb, author of Origines Judaicæ, recently published by Messrs. Innes & Co. The work deals with the heathen cults of Canaan, such as sun, ancestor, tree, serpent and phallic worship, with the object of tracing their influence on the birth and growth of Judaism.

INTENDING subscribers to the English Dialect Dictionary are urgently requested to send in their names at once, either to the secretary, Prof. Wright, 6, Norham-road, Oxford, or to the treasurer, the Rev. Prof. Skeat, 2, Salisbury-villas, Cambridge. The subscription is one guinea a year for eight years (or two guineas for a special edition on hand-made paper, limited to 250 copies). Descriptive circulars will be forwarded upon application to the secretary or treasurer. The first subscription, for 1896, is now due, and entitles the subscriber to a copy of parts i. and ii., at the end of June and December respectively.

ON January 21 the Guardian completes its fiftieth year. With the paper of the following day will be published a special supplement, containing a review of the origin and history of the Guardian, and articles on the attitude of the Church towards various questions in 1896 as compared with 1846.

THERE are no less than five vacancies to be filled this year among the Knights of the Ordre pour la Mérite. This is a very large number, considering that the number of the real knights is restricted to twenty for scientific and ten for artistic merit. The death-list consists of Gneist, Freytag, Sybel, Neumann, and Ludwig. The four seniors are now Menzel (Chancellor), Mommsen (Vice-Chancellor), Bunsen, and Max Müller.

THE Nottinghamshire Provincial Grand Lodge of Freemasons has decided to establish a library and museum; and Mr. J. Potter Briscoe, public librarian of Nottingham, has been appointed to the office of honorary librarian and curator.

AT the London Institution, on Monday next, Mr. I. Gollancz, of Christ's College, Cambridge, will deliver a lecture on "Schoolmasters and Plays," in which we detect a reference to Nicholas Udall; while on Thursday Prof. Mahaffy will lecture at the same place on "The Macedonians in Egypt," the subject of his book, The Empire of the Ptolemies, recently published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

THE two following afternoon lectures will be delivered at the Royal Institution during January, in addition to the arrangements already announced: "To the North of Lake Rudolf and Among the Gallas," by Dr. A.

Donaldson Smith, and "The Valley of Kashmir," by Mr. Walter R. Lawrence.

At the meeting of the Anglo-Russian Literary Society, to be held at the Imperial Institute on Tuesday next, at 3 p.m., a paper will be read in Russian on "The Results of Russian Civilisation in Central Asia," by M. de Bogdanovich, who served as an officer in Central Asia, and who is now the correspondent of several Russian newspapers.

MR. DAVID NUTT has issued the sale catalogue of a library "brought together by an eminent folk-lore," consisting of nearly 3000 lots. It is the collection not of a bibliophile, but of a scholar, who sought for the materials of his study in all sorts of quarters, and who not only annotated his books, but also supplied them with elaborate indices. He seems to have been specially devoted to Celtic history and folk-lore; but his interests included chap-books, proverbs, riddles, local traditions, the occult sciences, comparative religion, and archaeology. The catalogue has been compiled in one alphabet, without any subdivision of subjects. We must, however, mention forty-six lots under "Miscellaneous," consisting of bound volumes of pamphlets, &c., for the most part collected with reference to some special subject.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

TO AMERICANS.

A message from your Chief: and must we hear From you a cry for blood, the very same
As fills your veins? Remember whence ye came.
As some hoar father, if his son should jeer,
Would stand and tremble in exceeding fear,
So England shudders through her mighty frame,
Will not believe, and puts elsewhere the blame,
Content so you from infamy be clear:
We joy in battle fiercely as of yore;
At cry of a half-murdered people, brave,
Our hearts clung at our sides: war shall not cease;
But you, O summer travellers to our shore,
By the green fields ye tread to Shakspeare's grave,
With you for evermore there must be peace.

STEPNIAK.

(Obit December 23, 1895.)

One man there was ignored a tyrant's will,
One resolute voice that thundered o'er the fight;
The valiant heart, though dead, is living still,
Lo! the sun rises while we wail "Good-night!"

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE December number of the Library (Simpkin Marshall & Co.), which completes the seventh year of issue, contains two articles of general interest. One is a paper read before the Cardiff meeting of the Library Association by Mr. W. Eilir Evans on "Welsh Publishing and Bookselling." Besides a general summary of early Welsh bibliography, of the first printing of Welsh books in England, and of the beginnings of the printing press in Wales, it gives curious details about the methods of publishing and bookselling in the Principality during the present century, and concludes with an appeal for the establishment of some central agency for the compilation of an authorised register of all publications that pass through the hands of Welsh printers, from the ballad or penny almanac up to the voluminous encyclopaedia. The other article, reprinted from the Manchester Guardian, is an account of the unique collection of books, pamphlets, &c., relating to the gipsies, formed by M. Paul Bataillard, of Paris, which has recently been acquired by the Manchester Free Library. The collection consists of between 400 and 500 lots, most of them with tables of contents and notes by the late owner. He wrote himself many pamphlets, from which it appears that he was ultimately led to abandon Pott's theory of an Indian origin of the gipsies early in the fifth century A.D., in favour of another theory which would attribute to them the spread of a knowledge of bronze among the neolithic races of Europe. It is stated that the library committee propose to issue a special catalogue of the Bataillard collection.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GUTENBERG AND STRASBURG—SOME GRAVE DOUBTS.

20, Cullingham-place, S.W.

In a previous letter I ventured to question the authenticity of a document often quoted in the controversies about Gutenberg. I now propose to give reasons for my scepticism, in which I may be led to assume a somewhat revolutionary attitude.

It is one of the misfortunes of a dispute like that which has arisen about the origin of printing, in which local jealousies and ambitions have been greatly stirred, that the champions of different theories have not scrupled to forge evidence and to manufacture documents; and this has specially been the case with Gutenberg. Thus, there has been a strong attempt made to transfer some part of the credit of the discovery of printing from Mainz to Strasburg. This claim of Strasburg to share in the honour seems to me to be extremely doubtful, and to be supported by very sinister evidence. After examining the documents, as printed, with some care, I doubt whether several of the most important of those connecting Gutenberg with Strasburg are genuine at all.

The first of these, dated March 24, 1424, and purporting to be a letter written by our hero from Strasburg to his sister Berthe, a nun in the Convent of St. Clara at Mainz, has, I think, been proved by Schaab and others to be beyond all question a forgery of the librarian Bodman, who also sophisticated one or two other documents. But a much more important and more serious matter remains behind. In the year 1760 Schoepplin published his famous Vindiciae Typographiae. In this he championed the cause of Strasburg; and for the first time printed several documents, all of which seem to me, as they seemed to Mr. Hessels, to be at least suspicious. It is a great misfortune in an inquiry like this that the great library at Strasburg was burnt when that city was bombarded by the Prussians; for we cannot any longer examine the documents themselves, but are obliged to fall back upon internal and other evidence. In view of this, it is significant that at least two of the documents published by Schoeplin in the work just mentioned have been declared by Van der Linde to have been forged, and they certainly bear very strong evidence of the fact. In this view Mr. Hessels concurs. One of these purports to give an account of the summoning of Gutenberg before the judge at Strasburg by a young noble lady of Alsace, whom he is supposed to have abused, and is said afterwards to have married. The other one purports to be a copy of certain entries in the books of the Monastery of St. Thomas at Strasburg, giving an account of Gutenberg's default in the annual payment of a certain tax, and in one instance of his alleged wife Anna having paid it. I agree with Van der Linde that the two documents in question cannot be trusted; and if Schoeplin was capable of forging them, what possible faith can we have in the other documents which he claimed to have discovered, and which he was the first to publish?

Not only is there a prima facie case made out in this way, but the remaining evidence against them is itself very strong. One of these documents I will freely translate:

"I, John Gensefleisch the Younger, called Gutenberg, make it known by these letters that, inasmuch as the honest and wise Burgermasters and Council of the town of Mainz are bound to pay me annually certain interest and dividends—this is attested by documents, which provide that if the said interest and dividends are not paid, I may proceed to recover them forcibly—and inasmuch as for several years the said city of Mainz has not been willing to pay me what it owes, I, driven by my necessity, went before Dom. Nicholas, the Secretary of Mainz, who undertook to pay me 310 Rhenish florins, which were to be paid at Oppenheim, in the house 'Zum Lampart,' belonging to my cousin Artgeld, before the Feast of Pentecost next coming. I make it known by these letters that the Master and Council of the town of Strasburg have induced me, for the honour and love I bear them, to completely release the said Dom. Nicholas, public scribe, from the penalty of imprisonment which he has earned, and from the said sum of 310 florins. Given the Sunday after the Feast of St. Gregory the Pope, 1434."

This document, as we see, is dated on Sunday after St. Gregory's Day, the Saint Pope, 1434. This is in itself a suspicious circumstance, since the date is ambiguous. As Bernard says, there were two popes of the name, and one of them had two feast days—namely, March 12 and September 3. It is very unlikely that a document of such an important character would be thus dated. Secondly, in this document Gutenberg is styled "Johann Gensefleisch der Junge, genaunt Gutenberg." These names are very suspicious. Gutenberg is nowhere else, that I know of, called Johann Gensefleisch der Junge. On the other hand, there is a document extant, given by Schaab, in which a Johann Gensefleisch der Junge and Gutenberg are both mentioned, showing they were two different persons. In that document Johann Gensefleisch der Junge is styled "von Sorgenlooh," and, so far as we know, Gutenberg did not belong to the family of Sorgenlooh; but we also know that it was the theory of Schoeplin himself that he belonged to that stock. The document proceeds to recount what seems to me an incredible story. Gutenberg, who was so poor that he had to make arrangements by which a dividend of thirteen guilders owed him by the town of Mainz had to be split into two portions so as to provide something for his mother, is made for no conceivable reason to surrender and forego a sum of 310 Rhenish guilders, which were owing him by the city of Mainz, and to do so to an official who is called the secretary of Mainz, Nicholas, and this merely to please the council of the city of Strasburg. Reference is also made to a cousin of Gutenberg's named Artgeld living at Oppenheim, who is otherwise unknown. The whole story seems to me ridiculous and incredible. Let us pass on.

The next documents fill a larger place in the history of Gutenberg as usually told, and have been the subject-matter of much comment. They purport to be the depositions of witnesses and the judgment of the court in a certain suit which is said to have happened in the year 1439.

They are said to have occurred in the form of six separate entries in three separately bound MSS. purporting to be registers of the city of Strasburg. Two of the entries were in one volume—one occupying folios 107-110, and the other folios 117 and 118. The third, fourth, and fifth entries were respectively on the recto of leaf 21, on the lower part of leaf 38, and occupying the whole recto of the 44th leaf of another volume. The last entry is said to have occurred in a third volume, which, according to Lobstein, as quoted by Mr. Hessels, was burnt in a great holocaust of documents on November 20, 1793. The other two volumes were seen by Dibdin, Laborde, and others, and have been described by them. Now it is a remarkable fact that Dibdin, who examined them, and was a practised bibliographer, says:

"I inspected these documents (in the German language) with no ordinary curiosity. They are doubtless most precious; yet I cannot help suspecting that the character or letter is not of the time—namely, of 1440. It should rather seem to be of the sixteenth century. Perhaps at the commencement of it. . . . Certainly the whole book has very much the air of a copy; and, besides, would not the originals have been upon separate rolls of parchment?"

This is surely remarkable testimony, for Dibdin, so far as we know, did not suspect the documents, only the writing; and we cannot avoid thinking his deduction a fair one. It is most unlikely that the original records of a suit should be scattered at haphazard in this way in six separate entries in three separate volumes; and even if they were entered on paper instead of parchment, the entries would have been continuous, and not discrete in this fashion. It is equally difficult to believe that an honest and real copy of the original documents would have been thus scattered not only over several separate leaves, but in some cases beginning half-way down a page; and it seems to me only compatible with some forger, who, finding several blank pages in three old account-books, distributed his materials over them to disarm suspicion or for some other purpose.

Again, Laborde, who believed in the documents which he saw and collated, writes (and the sentence, in view of what I have just said, reads very ominously):

"Everything connected with the lawsuit is written in the volume by the same scribe, who, each time that he resumed his work, imparted a little more firmness to his hand, a circumstance which makes it appear as if several scribes had taken part in the work, whereas it is evident that it is that of a single man. It is, moreover, certain that it is the original redaction—indeed, the original minute of the transactions, because all the erasures and the additions written in the margin are in the same ink and in the same hand, and could not have been found in a copy, however clumsy this may have been" (Hessels, Gutenberg, 24, 25).

are in the same hand, point assuredly to the writer of the documents being also their composer. When we further remember that these two volumes, both dated in 1439, are apparently the only ones of the series extant; that they were both enclosed in a pasteboard case labelled "Documenta typographiae Argentorati inventae," apparently by Schoeplin himself; that that most suspected person, who was only too ready to write on the subject, actually claims to have known them, in the case of one volume, for twenty-one years, and in the other for sixteen years, before publishing them in extenso—the matter becomes more and more suspicious. The whole story, in fact, makes up a web which is full of sinister doubt and difficulty.

The internal evidence seems to me to be also very dubious. First the spelling of the names, which in legal documents of this kind one would expect to be uniform, is anything but uniform—Gutenberg's own name being spelt in many different ways. In one place, again, we have the extraordinary phrase in the deposition of one of the witnesses, "Min juncker Hanns Gutenberg hatt noch gebetten das," &c. This is certainly an extraordinary way of referring to Gutenberg, who had no pretensions to be styled a Junker. In the next place, Gutenberg is spoken of throughout as if he was a man of considerable wealth, whereas we know he was badly off. The statements testified to by the witnesses, again, are indefinite, and like those which a man would insert if he was forging a document.

Again, when Schoeplin wrote it was thought that the invention of printing at Mainz took place in 1440, not 1450. In making out a case for Strasburg he has, therefore, to go behind that year, and in one passage of the depositions he makes Gutenberg go to the great fair at Aachen in 1439. But, as Wyss has shown in his review of Van der Linde's work, the great fair at Aachen was septennial, and took place in 1440, but not in 1439.

Then, there is the well-known and single reference to printing in the testimony of Hans Dünne, in which he says he had earned from Gutenberg nearly a hundred guildens merely for that which belonged to printing (zu dem trucken gehöret). It is extraordinary, as Dr. Van der Linde and Mr. Hessels both remark, to find this word trucken used by a witness at this particular date, when printing, if known at all, must have been a secret art. So that the technical word truken is not likely to have been understood at all by the court, or by anybody else, unless applied to cutting wooden blocks, and cutting wooden blocks would not be the work of a goldsmith. So the reference to the "press" and the "formes" are also very ambiguous; and the whole, in fact, seems to me like a document deliberately prepared to found some ultimate claim upon a number of mystifying sentences. I am bound to say that Schoeplin's translation is also very suspicious, and reads like that of a man who having forged a document in one language read his own meaning into it. Thus we have him on the very same page translating the common word stück or "piece" in one case by "page" and in another by "form," and, again, he translates spiegel and polier arbeiten by artes mirabiles et secretas.

For these reasons I hold the documents I have criticised to be so suspicious as to be worthless as evidence. If so, two facts are established. First, there is no evidence of any connexion between Gutenberg and Strasburg before the year 1442; and, secondly, no evidence that he had anything to do with printing before 1450. I must now close this too long letter. Perhaps you may tolerate another presently.

HENRY H. HOWORTH.

THE SIN-EATER IN WALES.

III.

London: Dec. 18, 1895.

Nothing has struck me so much in Mr. Hartland's treatment of this question as his absolute ignoring of Christian rites. He quotes an account of a funeral custom in Eastern Europe, but he appears to have no notion that every part of the ceremony described can be accounted for by the practice of the Orthodox Church. An account is given of another burial custom in Bavaria, but there are no traces of an inquiry into the history of Catholic rites in that part of the world. Like Wamba's pax vobiscum, "Celtic" blood is the key to it all. It is the same in England. Is there a peculiar funeral custom in Derbyshire? Oh, "the population is probably still to a great extent of Celtic ancestry." When we come to Herefordshire and Shropshire, why, we are there right in the Welsh March, which must be saturated with Celticism.

I need not point out that the Early England of that border was, like the rest of England, a pagan country, from which the native Christian population had been scattered in flight to the hills beyond Severn and Wye. Ecclesiastical authorities, both Roman and Anglican, freely acknowledged that heathen customs have always been admitted, within certain limits, into the Christian Church. But so far as I can make out, Mr. Hartland has not set himself the task of tracing the Christian doctrines of atonement, transubstantiation, purgatory, and so on, back to savage origins. It is not the elements of heathenism in Christianity, but the survivals of heathen beliefs and rites in Christian lands outside the church, that he has been looking for. Now the Welsh border is, I admit, a very promising field for such an investigation. Just at that point the "wedge of heathendom," as Green calls it, which had been thrust into the heart of Western Christianity, and had divided it into two unequal parts, was not converted quite so easily as it was further east. Even after the conversion of the pagan English, the innate conservatism of the race would of itself, without other evidence, lead one to expect that many heathen customs would long hold their own in England, in spite of bell, book, and candle. But there is no need to depend on a priori reasoning. Direct evidence exists in abundance. In the volume of Anecdotes and Traditions edited for the Camden Society by W. J. Thoms there are numerous extracts from Aubrey's Remaines, including the well-known ballad formerly used at Yorkshire funerals.

On the stanza—

"From Brig of Drod that thou mayest pass
No brader than a thread,
Every night and awle,
To Purgatory fire thou com'st at last,
And Christ receive thy sawle—"

Thoms has a very interesting note, and a reference to Grimm's Deutsche Mythologie, xxi. In fact, he was content to look, in the first place, to Teutonic sources for the ancestry of English beliefs and customs. That was, of course, long before the promulgation of Matthew Arnold's somewhat extravagant theory of the Celtic spirit in English literature. After the spirit, we naturally come to the body; and now we find that at every funeral ceremony, from the Black Sea to the Black Mountain of Wales,

"The trail of the Celt is over them all."

But further, there is the unimpeachable evidence of the laws and canons of the Anglo-Saxon Church. From the days of Wiltred of Kent to those of the Norman Conquest we find, for example, references to "diviners and sooth-sayers," "offering to devils," "lyblac," "illustrations of pagan rites, worshipping idols or heathen gods, the sun, the moon, the fire,* rivers, fountains, the elder tree," "the practice of witchcraft," and "exorcism."

I do not think that Mr. Hartland can find evidence of Welsh heathenism, to anything like the same extent, in the pre-Norman annals of the British Church.

The Church has always found it a hard task to keep "the most diligent bishop in all England," as Latimer calls a certain personage, from sowing tares among Christian wheat. On this point I beg leave to extract the tenth article of Archbishop Stratford's Constitutions (A.D. 1343). I take it as translated in Johnson of Cranbrook's Collections:

"A probable good often becomes an experienced evil, and then an alteration is allowable. It is a devout custom of the faithful to observe night-watches in behalf of the dead before their burial, and to do it sometimes in private houses, to the intent that the faithful there meeting together and watching might devoutly intercede for them with God; but by the arts of Satan this wholesome practice of the ancients is turned into buffoonry and filthy revels; prayers are neglected, and these watchings are become rendez-vous for adulteries, fornications, thefts, and other misdoings; as a remedy for so rife a disease, we ordain that when ecclesiastical men have performed the memories (exsequias) of the dead, none for the future be admitted to the accustomed night-watches at private houses, where dead corpses often remain till their burial, the relations and such as say psalters for the dead only excepted, under pain of the greater excommunication."

Of the eleven "comprovincial bishops" present at the publication of this Constitution in St. Paul's, only one was from Wales—namely, David, Bishop of Bangor. "There is superstition," says Bacon, "in avoiding superation, when men thinke to doe best, if they goe furthest from the superstition formerly received." Our own Reformation affords some notable examples of this.

"In the time of popery," says Latimer (Works, i. 547, Parker Society), "before the Gospel came amongst us, we went to burials with weeping and wailing as though there were no God: but since the Gospel came unto us, I have heard say that in some places they go with the corpses grinning and laughing, as though they went to a bear-baiting, which thing no doubt is nought."

From Mr. Edward Peacock's notes to his edition of John Myre's Instructions to the Clergy (R.E.T.S.) I take the following:

"Chrismatories and fonts were ordered to be kept securely locked, for fear that weak or evil-disposed persons should steal the holy oils or consecrated wafer for magical purposes." "It was customary in early times for the receivers to carry home the pamis benedictus. It was said that in the fifteenth century some people used to employ it as a charm, and on that account carry it about their persons." "The holy bread, the holy loaf, or eulogia, was ordinary leavened bread cut into small pieces, blessed, and given to the people after mass was over."

That copious man, Bishop Bale, in his Image of the Two Churches, gives an interesting list of the material adjuncts of worship to which superstition clung. I have only room here to refer to the "pardon-masers or drinking-dishes." These are, no doubt, of the same origin as the "grace-cups" of Oxford colleges, and the "loving cup" of Guildhall banquets. "These masers are shallow bowls of wood," says Dr. Rock (Church of our Fathers, ii. 340, 341),

"light, thin, and mostly quite black, which sets off the rim and mounting of silver, oftentimes gilt, extremely well. . . . Of the several maser-bowls still in existence, though only a few are indulged, all show in the inscription running round the edge a something that speaks of religion."

* Cf. what Mr. Elton (Origins of English History) says of the ceremony of passing the "funeral-ale" cup through the fire.

In the vestry of York Cathedral there is a fine one unto which Archbishop Scrope and another bishop had each granted an indulgence of xl. days."

In that most Protestant of all Welsh counties, Cardiganshire, about five miles from Aberystwith, there is the seat of an ancient Welsh family, the Powells of Nanteos. Nanteos is famous through the county for its "healing cup." In Wales for November his Honor Judge David Lewis has an interesting paper on this cup. From a couple of cuts illustrating the article, it is evident that the Nanteos healing cup is an old maser-bowl. Unfortunately its former history is not given; and I know not whether the superstition attaching to it is a real survival of Roman Catholic times, or a mere modern revival. The vessel may have been secured by some careful picker-up of such "toys" from the wreckage of the neighbouring abbey of Strata Florida. However that may be, within an easy walk of Nanteos is the Mecca of Welsh Methodism, Llangelitho. For the last hundred years or so, at scores of chapels in that part of Cardiganshire, the bread and wine of Holy Communion have been handed round from one seated partaker to another, with an absence of superstitious formalism that would have satisfied Zwingli himself. And yet all the time this time-worn and mutilated old maser-bowl of Nanteos, which has never, of course, been used in the service of the Mass, but which has possibly been "indulged" in olden days, is regarded by the ultra-Protestants of Cardiganshire with superstitious reverence, and as still possessed of healing virtues. From some curious memoranda drawn up by an old butler of Nanteos, and quoted by Judge Lewis, I select one (out of about twenty-five, ranging in date from 1857 to 1889):

"November 24th, 1887. The Nanteos healing cup was lent on the above date to Charles Edwards for the use of his daughter, Mary Edwards. One pound left. Returned 13th December, 1887. A wonderful cure." The italics are not mine.

Mr. Elton, in his Origins of English History, is mistaken when he says that Wirt Sikes had given a full description of the ceremonies connected with the notorious cursing-well of St. Elvan, near Denbigh. Wirt Sikes says nothing of the cup.

In Goleuad Cymru for May, 1819 (i., pp. 110 et seq.), there is a very full account of the trial of one of the "cunning men" (dygion hyspys) who exploited that well. Part of the sworn evidence is as follows:

"Then he [i.e., John Edwards, the cunning man] emptied the well with a small wooden cup. When doing so, he prayed to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Then the well filled again. He then filled the cup with water, and asked me to drink some of it, and to throw the rest over my head. He said I must do that three times, and so I did."

It is a well-known North Walian institution to sing improvised verses to the accompaniment of the harp. This is called "Pennillion singing." Hundreds of these rhymes, many of them bearing the marks of considerable age, have been preserved by tradition. A prize was offered at the Denbigh Eisteddfod (1828) for the best collection of pennillion. Absalom Roberts won the prize. He subsequently published a small volume of poems (Llanrwst, 1832), in which will be found a further collection of some two hundred stanzas. At the end of the little book the author says that he had gathered "From place to place, at various times,

More than a thousand ancient rhymes."

The following are the only verses pertinent to this discussion:

"On Shrove-Tide eve a wife I married,
Brief was the time with her I tarried,
Ash-Wednesday morn across the bed
I found her lying stiff and dead;

Then I offered 'neath her head
A piece of cheese, a loaf of bread,
And of ale a mighty bowl—
May that rest upon her soul!"

Offrymais is the Welsh word for "offered" in the fifth line. The English and the Welsh are, of course, of the same Latin origin. Unlike the English word, however, the Welsh one is confined strictly to the religious meaning. Cognates are: offeren (the service of the Mass), and offeiriad (priest), the commonest term for "clergyman" in Welsh, but never applied to Dissenting ministers.

Handing the dole to the poor bedesman across the corpse may perhaps have no meaning beyond that of mere convenience. More probably, however, a deeper meaning was read into the action. Making the sign of the cross lingered on in North Wales till, certainly, the time of John Aubrey. Thus Richard Davies, the Welsh Quaker, says in his autobiography:

"About this time [1658] I went to visit some young men . . . two or three of them were convinced . . . When we came to the number of four . . . we determined to meet upon a hill in a common as near as we could, for the convenience of each other. . . . There we met in silence, to the wonder of the country. . . . We were not free to go into any neighbour's enclosures, for they were so blind, dark, and ignorant that they looked upon us as witches, and would go away from us, some crossing themselves with their hands about their foreheads and faces."

It is only within the last hundred years or so that, broadly speaking, there has been any demand for non-devotional Welsh literature, for it is only within that period that Welshmen who could not read English have been able to read at all. It is rather difficult, therefore, to find any eighteenth century Welsh accounts of Welsh customs. Even during the first half of this century, such reading was looked upon by rigid Methodists as profane, and on the same level as whistling on Sundays or singing manodd (a term applied to all non-spiritual songs, such as the "Men of Harlech" and "Dafydd y Garreg Wen.") And so, almost down to our own day, vernacular accounts of native customs are not common, and when met with they generally turn out to be simply translations from English. The only Welsh account, for instance, of Welsh funerals which Mr. Hartland did not find in my letter to Prof. Rhys—I mean his extract from Cymru Fy—has been translated from the Rev. John Evans's Tour in North Wales (1804).

I have picked out the following questions from Goleued Cymru for June, 1819, and May, 1821. The answers are mainly "Scripture proofs," and therefore of no folk-lore interest.

"What is the meaning of putting lighted candles in brass candlesticks on the coffin?"

"Why do people lean on the coffin to pray?"

"Is that a sign of an old custom of praying for the dead?" "The second Sunday after a burial the relations of the deceased keep a 'memorial knell' (clui coffa) that Sunday, and feast throughout the day."

"Is it an unseemly and sinful thing for people to drink ale and smoke tobacco at funerals; and whence has that custom sprung?"

Mr. Hartland, strangely enough, left off his quotation from Robert Jones, of Rhoslan, at the very point where the "ritual words" come in. The original proceeds as follows:—

"The whole family on the first Sunday after the burial used to go on their knees on the grave, each saying his Paternoster (ei Bader). And they would never mention any deceased member or relative of the family without saying most devoutly 'Heaven be his portion' (Nesodd iddo!)"

And thus we see that the "ritual words" of these "sin-eating" customs can be "shorn off" as ruthlessly by our folk-loreist as by old Father Time himself.

I should like to quote the Rev. W. Bingley's two accounts of the North Wales custom in question—the traditional one as supplied to him most probably by his friend, the Rev. Peter Williams, Vicar of Llanberis; and the actual one as observed and most graphically described by himself. I dare not, however, lay such a burden on the Editor's patience, but must content myself, on my way to Aubrey, with the following:

"When we came to the church we found the place nearly full of people waiting our arrival. The service was read in Welsh in a most impressive manner, and the coffin was let down into the grave by four of the female mourners. A more solemn office I had never witnessed, and the circumstance of the body being committed to the bosom of the earth by the hands of relatives or friends was altogether new to me. A few rushes were strewed upon the coffin, and I shall never forget the stifled shriek that was uttered when, in Welsh, the solemn words, 'We commit her body to the ground,' &c., were read. . . . The ceremony being over, the grave was filled up, and planted with slips of box and some other evergreens. The offerings in the church amounted to near two pounds, of which more than thirty shillings were in silver."

Mr. Hartland has not pointed out in plain terms, as I submit he ought to have done, that only on a single occasion did Aubrey witness personally the funeral ceremonies he describes. That was at Beaumaris, in North Wales. On that occasion the ceremony reminded Aubrey, not of his "own invention" the Sin-eater, but of church funeral offertories or "mortuaries." This custom of mortuaries, once universal in the Church, was kept up in many parts of North Wales until almost the other day. Indeed, no small portion of the North Walian clergy's income used to be derived from that source. But that the custom was a thoroughly English one can be proved at once from the name—"Soul-scent," which it bore in the Anglo-Saxon Church. The proper place for its payment, according to the laws of that Church, was "at the open grave."

"Simple astonishment" will best describe my feelings when the custom in North Wales is described as that of "Sin-eating, shorn of the ritual words," and when that custom is asserted to have "certainly existed uncurtailed in the seventeenth century at Llangors." Surely Mr. Hartland does not translate Aubrey's ipso facto by "in so many words"? I think I am entitled to assume that he has placed before us all the particulars in his possession relative to the "uncurtailed" custom and its "ritual" words. Has he, perchance, perused the will of the woman of Dynder, according to the direction of which, "volens volens the parson of the parish," her relations had the ceremony in question "punctually performed"? Uncorroborated and unconfirmed, the vague and ambiguous testimony of Aubrey is absolutely worthless. I can find no such term as "Sin-eater" in Sir George Cornewall Lewis's list of Herefordshire words. As Mr. Hartland apparently quotes straight from Mr. Britten's edition of the Remains, it is no large assumption to suppose that he has read that volume with some care. What are we to say, then, of the candour of his touching expression of confidence in the credibility of John Aubrey, when the following extract of a letter from Ray, the naturalist, to Aubrey himself is to be found in the editor's preface to that very volume?

"I think (if you can give me leave to be free with you) that you are a little too inclinable to credit strange relations. I have found men that are not skilful in the history of nature very credulous and apt to impose upon themselves and others, and therefore dare not give a firm assent to anything they report upon their own authority, but am ever suspicious that they may either be deceived themselves, or delight to terratologize (pardon the word), and to make a show of knowing strange things."

Such is the character of our sole authority for "Sin-eating," so called. It is drawn not behind Aubrey's back by a carping Anthony Wood, but to his own face by a friendly hand.

J. P. OWEN.

THE DERIVATION OF "EDDA."

Cambridge: Dec. 27, 1895.

In the ACADEMY of December 21 Dr. Karl Blind takes exception to the statement that "no one had yet deemed it worth while to examine how far Snorri Sturluson's connexion with Oddi was an historical fact that might be made to throw any light on the derivation of Edda," on the ground that "the same view as to Edda being derived from Oddi was brought forward many years ago" by Prof. Anderson, who in the introduction to his translation of the Younger Edda (p. 26) says: "Some have suggested that it may be a mutilated form of the word Odde, the home of Sæmund the Wise, who was long supposed to be the compiler of the Elder Edda."

My view of the derivation of Edda as a book title is much older than, and totally independent of, Anderson's statement, with the foundation for which, by the way, I am quite unacquainted, and of the existence of which foundation I entertain strong doubt, seeing that Edda is no "mutilated form" of Odde, but strictly lautgesetzlich. Long after I had formed my opinion as to the derivation of Edda, I came upon Arne Magnússon's statement, in his preface to the first volume of the Copenhagen quarto edition of the Older Edda, that Biörn of Skarðsa, who took Sæmund for the author of Edda, had absurdly suggested to derive it from Odde.*

The account of the constructive part of my paper shows plainly, that my conclusion on this point is the result of inductive reasoning based on historical evidence—the only evidence to which I attach any real value—and is in no way due to any reports of derivative snap-shots from the seventeenth century or any other time.

Dr. Blind thinks that "probably a great many will continue to hold the view hitherto prevalent regarding the meaning of Edda." This view, if I understand Dr. Blind correctly, is that Edda means "great-grandmother." Yet he confesses, "it need scarcely be added, that the Edda of Rígmál is, of course, not the mother of Amma." But the Edda of Rígmál, as an appellation for "woman," is the only Edda "hitherto" known; and the author of that poem gives his readers clearly to understand that by Edda and Ai he means "great-grandmother" and "great-grandfather," just as seriously as by afi and amma, faðir and móðir he means "grandparents" and "parents" respectively.

But the "prevalent" view regarding the meaning of Edda is, according to Dr. Blind's interpretation, that "great-grandmother" really signifies "typical ancestress, Ahnfrau, elder mother." But how, in Rígmál, "Edda" is a more "typical ancestress" than are "Amma" and "Móðir" I, for one, fail to see. And to the authority of Rígmál, under this interpretation—that the mother of slaves is more of a "typical ancestress, Ahnfrau, or elder mother," than are mothers of free and nobly born men—I decline to subscribe.

When it is granted that Edda cannot be the mother of "Amma," and consequently no great-grandmother at all, where is the justification for translating her name "great-grandmother," or for the interpretations which the adherents of this translation give the term? I cannot see that they have any historical, anthropological, etymological, or common sense ground to stand on.

Edda is a regular feminine derivative from Oddi (or Oddr), originally an appellative term = point, but at an early age also adopted as a personal name, meaning homo masculus; and, without penetrating into the etymological secret of the form, Edda meant simply Oddi's mate = woman. It is a formation to which many parallels, etymological and other, may be found in Northern names: (Arn-)þórr: -þóra; Ási: Ása; Birni (dat.): Birna; Finni: Finna; Grímr Gríma; Halli: Halla; Hrafn: Hrefna; Ólaf: Ólöf, &c.

That the mutation Odd- > Edd- is comparatively late, and, so far as I have yet been able to ascertain, peculiar to Icelandic, I could understand being urged against the above derivation. But where is the evidence of the high age of Rigsmál? Where the proof that it was not framed in Iceland from the legend after which the introductory lines inform us it was composed?

Edda represents simply the wedded woman of the humble peasant class; Amma the well-do goodwife of the franklin order; and Mother the lady of the aristocracy. But that the name of this woman (Edda) should ever have been given to the book or books that bear it, for that there is no title of evidence nor any common sense reason adducible.

ERIKR MAUNÓSSON.

P.S.—I take it for granted that Dr. Blind does not regard any of the other derivations of Edda, with which the destructive criticism of my paper dealt, as hitherto prevalently upheld; and I therefore abstain from bringing forward here the evidence on which I tried to show that they were untenable.

THE TURKS.

London: Dec. 23, 1895

In the ACADEMY for December 21 (p. 548) Mr. E. H. Parker states somewhat positively that the word "Türk" "goes no farther back than the fifth century of our era," and that, "so far as recorded history is concerned, the name of Turk dates from this time." This is a mistake; for Turki tribes bearing this national name had penetrated into south-east Europe probably long before the new era, and were in any case seated on the Don in the first century. They are mentioned by name both by Pomponius Mela (circa 50 A.D.): "Budini Gelonion urbem ligneam habitant; juxta Thyssagetæ Turcæque vastas silvas occupant aluturque venando"; and by Pliny (ob. 79 A.D.): "Dein Tanain [Don] amnem . . . incolunt Sarmatæ . . . Tindari, Thyssegetæ, Tyræ usque ad solitudines altuos convallibus asperæ," &c. He will find the references in my Ethnology (p. 304), where I have attempted to throw some light on the obscure questions connected with the origin, early migrations, and later interminglings of the Mongolo-Turki peoples.

TWO BOOKS ON THE PSALMS.

"SACRED BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT."—The Book of Psalms in Hebrew. By Julius Wellhausen. (Baltimore: The John Hopkins Press; Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs; London: David Nutt.)

I Salmi, tradotti dal testo Ebraico comparato colle antiche versioni con introduzione e note. Sac. Salvatore Minocchi. (Firenze: Seeber.)

PROF. WELLHAUSEN's critical edition of the Hebrew text in Prof. Haupt's invaluable series will be generally appreciated for its insight and moderation. It was high time that such a work should be produced; and from the point of view of all but a specialist in the Psalter, the present contribution is satisfactory. I heartily recommend it to the growing public of students of the Hebrew Scriptures. If I add a criticism, it is from no love of finding fault. Prof. Wellhausen does not seem to have made a thorough study of the works of his predecessors. I have noticed the name of Bickell but once, and that of Baethgen not even once. Nor do I think that Prof. Wellhausen has read my own work on the Psalms (1888), which has critical notes on the same plan as his own, only with many more references to other scholars. The reference on Ps. xlv. 14 is at any rate an isolated one; and it is to the editor that a reference to Prof. Abbott's essay on the alphabetical arrangement of Ps. ix. and x. and to my own Origin of the Psalter is due on p. 77. But I heartily agree with Prof. Wellhausen's admiration for Justus Olshausen, who, considering the date of his book on the Psalms (1853), saw wonderfully far into the secrets of the Psalter—secrets which still to a large extent baffle us, though the last forty years have not been barren of many good results. I will only mention three of Wellhausen's suggestions and corrections, one of which at least I am ashamed that, by a relic of conservatism, I did not long since adopt. These are:

(1) Ps. ii. 12, where, though the text

only indicates that the opening words are corrupt, the critical note suggests that the LXX. perhaps read קחו מוסר "receive instruction."

(2) Ps. xxii. 22, where, advancing beyond Delitzsch, who (Psalms, by Eaton, i. 395) simply pronounces the reading a happier one than the עֲנִי of LXX., he definitely adopts J. F. Thrupp's correction, עֲנִי, "my poor one" (i.e., my soul; cf. יחידתי, ver. 21).

(3) Ps. lxxviii. 31, where בָּרָקֶסֶף "with bars (?) of silver" (Delitzsch), becomes בָּרָקֶי, in which an old and sound conjecture of Olshausen's is combined with an older one, rejected by that excellent critic.

I must confess my surprise that the accomplished editor, who permits himself to make additions in square brackets, did not mention Lagarde's felicitous treatment of the first of these passages in his Novae Psalterii Graeci editionis specimen (1886), where מוסר [מוסרי] נשקו "put on [again] his bond [or bonds]," is all but proved to be the right reading. As to the third, I am not sure that my own suggestion (Psalms, 1888) is not still worth mentioning, together with a short paper, in confirmation and development of Prof. Nestle's conjecture in the Journal of Biblical Literature (1892, pp. 125, 126).

I venture to make these remarks, which it would be tedious to multiply, in the interests of the new series of critical editions. The critical notes ought to be on a larger scale, and to show a greater width and liberality of view, to be quite worthy of the enormous pains bestowed on the getting-up of the work. That I am not insensible of the value of Prof. Wellhausen's judgment, I hope that I need not assure either the editor or himself; but we can none of us, in my opinion, afford to neglect our fellow-workers.

The second work mentioned above proceeds from a Roman Catholic professor at Florence. It is a valuable proof of the revival of Biblical studies which has begun in France and Italy. The list of books "most often consulted for the present work" is, it is true, a short one. But they have been consulted to good purpose, and the author has the credit due to a pioneer in an unfrequented region. Whether Biblical criticism can flourish in the Roman Church remains to be seen. American experiences (I refer to a remarkable article in the Revue Biblique by a Roman Catholic member of Prof. Haupt's seminary at the Johns Hopkins University) seems to justify hope; but from the present work on the Psalter not much can be gathered. The author is still in the bonds of traditionalism. The 68th Psalm is Davidic, in spite of its points of contact both with the Second Isaiah, with Isa. xxiv.-xxvii., and with the poem attached to the Book of Habakkuk. The "dove" whose "wings are covered with silver" (Ps. lxxviii. 14) is Deborah, who adorned herself with the spoil taken from the Canaanites. I notice with pleasure the illustrative translations from Babylonian and Egyptian hymns.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE committee of the Huxley Memorial have entered into communication with Mr. Onslow Ford, with reference to the statue which it is proposed to place in the Natural History Museum. The total amount of subscriptions received up to the present time is about £1600.

AMONG the knighthoods conferred on the occasion of the New Year we observe the name of Dr. John Prestwich, some time professor of geology at Oxford, and now the doyen of English geologists.

THE annual meeting of the Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching will be held at University College, Gower-street, on Saturday next. The morning meeting (at 11 a.m.) will be devoted to the ordinary business of the association. At the afternoon meeting (at 2 p.m.) Dr. Larmor will read a paper on "Geometrical Methods," and visitors interested in the subject will be cordially welcomed.

THE Sunday Lecture by Prof. Vivian B. Lewes on "Explosives," to be given to-morrow at St. George's Hall, Langham-place, will be illustrated with experiments, and specially adapted to a juvenile audience.

It is proposed to form a society to bring together more closely those who have taken up Reptiles as their hobby, and it is hoped that by this means interest may be kept up and mutual help secured by all concerned. Dr. Arthur Stradling has consented to become president. In order that a working basis may be secured at once, those who intend to become members should communicate with the Secretary, Rand Rectory, Wragby, Lincolnshire.

THE Académie des Sciences has awarded the Prix Valz to Mr. W. F. Denning, of Bristol, for his astronomical work—especially for his observations on shooting stars and his discoveries of comets.

PROF. G. K. GILBERT, of Washington, has been elected a foreign member, and Dr. A. Penck, of Vienna, has been elected a foreign correspondent, of the Geological Society.

THIS week the Institution of Civil Engineers keeps its seventy-eighth birthday. Its first president was Thomas Telford, who filled that office for no less than fourteen years. The oldest surviving president is Sir John Fowler (1866); and it happens that the post is held at present by his partner, Sir Benjamin Baker. The total number of members of all classes is now 6794, showing an increase of 135 during the past twelve months.

AT a recent meeting of the Linnean Society, the Rev. G. Henslow exhibited a MS. commonplace book of the latter end of the fourteenth century. The entries in Latin and English were found to consist chiefly of medical recipes, in which about 200 plants are named for their use, and some methods of distilling Aquæ Vitæ described. In addition were some notes on geometry and astronomy, and calculations of altitudes and superficies. Mr. Baker thought the number of plants named at the date referred to was a matter of some interest to botanists, and suggested publication of the list of names with their identification where possible.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

M. CAGNAT, the Latin epigraphist, has been elected a member of the Académie des Inscriptions, to fill the place vacant by the death of M. Derenbourg. His competitors were M. de Beaucourt and M. Salomon Reinach.

THE meeting of the Philological Society, to be held at University College on Friday next, will be a "dictionary evening," when Mr. Henry Bradley will present a report on his progress with the letter F in the New English Dictionary.

MR. E. W. B. NICHOLSON'S book on the Pictish inscriptions will be published immediately by Mr. Quaritch under the title, The Vernacular Inscriptions of the Ancient Kingdom of Alban Transcribed, Translated, and Explained.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

VIKING CLUB.—(Friday, December 13.)

THE Rev. A. Sandison, president, in the chair.—Mr. W. G. Collingwood read a paper on "The Vikings in Lakeland." The lecturer said that the place-names of the Lake-district have long been held to prove that it was colonised by Norse settlers. Analysis of the map defines the area of their principal settlement as covering not only the Lakes, but North Lonsdale, South Westmoreland, and Craven. Another group in the Cumbrian Holm connects with the Vikings across the Solway; and a third group fringes the Lancashire coast and focusses on the Mersey. There are thus three Norse colonies among districts as distinctly Danish, Anglian, and Celtic. Lake-district names, corrected by their early medieval forms and local pronunciation, can be shown to be strictly analogous to the Icelandic in meaning—e.g., Bla-with, Claif, Garth-sioh, Green-odd, Great-a, Iccorne-thwaite, Latter-barrow, Swene-breck; and they even preserve the grammar in such cases as Asmunder-lawe, Arne-side, Rammes-heved, Borchers-dale, &c. The use of "beck" where Icelanders used læk, as well as other early forms, suggests that the immigrants belonged to an earlier generation than those who fixed Icelandic names in the tenth century—that is, that they had left Norway with Thorgrim and Olaf the White. Their connexion with Ireland is proved by Gaelic loan-words such as Borran, Bare, and Butler (road), Kil, Korri (oats), Peel, and Parrock. Antiquarian evidence is supplied by survivals in dialect, customs, and traditions—e.g., the Arvel, shepherds' parliament, lug-mark; and strengthened by the persistence of Norse types in woodcarving, ironwork, and cottage architecture, as well as by the physical and mental character of the dalesmen. Archaeological evidence is drawn from the Tynwald Hill in Little Langdale, resembling the Manx Tynwald and the Thingmote of Dublin. The nature and age of the settlement being determined, we have to look for its circumstances and causes to the end of the ninth century, instead of to the close of the tenth, as hitherto believed. The Danes did not touch the ground in question, but colonised only the strip of country needed to protect their route between Dublin and York (894-952). The Lancashire Norse colony can be assigned to the year 900, when Agmund and his Lochlann, expelled from Dublin, were given land by Æthelstred, and settled quietly on the north border of Mercia. The subsequent history of this colony can be distinctly traced in the rising of 911, the submission to Edward of 922, the Norse names in Domesday, and place-names still extant, including their Thingwall. The Lakeland immigrants are more likely to have come from the Isle of Man, which was held (852-913) by the Norse of Ireland, under rulers closely connected with Irish kings and the Vikings of the South Isles. Against these Harald Fairhair came in 895, and found that the Vikings had fled, bag and baggage, to Scotland; which here must mean, not Galloway, for it was thence that Harald was coming, nor Ireland, where famine was in that year compelling emigration to Iceland; but the district in question, which was then reckoned under Scotland, or as debateable border. Less than thirty years afterwards (924) Northmen, who were neither Galloway men nor Agmund's Lancashire settlers, are named as submitting to Eadward; and the invasions of Eadmund (945) and Thored (966) were not to acquire territory, but to repress this colony, then growing and threatening to become an important Viking state. This is stated by Henry of Huntingdon as the object of Æthelred's expedition in 1000. Domesday Book shows that in 1086 all the landholders in this district, so far as it was surveyed, were Norse or Irish-Norse, except Earl Tosti; and the charters of the subsequent century prove that in spite of the Norman Conquest the Viking families still held their lands, and became the "Statesmen," with those holdings, allodial in origin, to explain which the legal fiction of Border tenure was afterwards invented.—Mr. J. Mitchell said that, with regard to the origin of the place-names referred to by Mr. Collingwood, while he was quite ready to admit that the Norsemen who colonised the Lake-country came thither from Ireland, he thought that the Welsh of Strathclyde were responsible for some of the Celtic names.—Mr. Collingwood replied to the effect that Celtic words compounded with Norse in the place-names of a Norse district might be regarded as Norse importations; but that there were certain districts in which clusters of place-names, both Cymric and Goidelic, showed survivals from primitive Celtic times and races.—Mr. F. T. Norris congratulated the society on the clear and learned paper to which it had been privileged to listen. He thought, however, that the particle "ing" occurring in place-names did not invariably signify a Saxon tribe or family, but sometimes grew out of a genitive ending in "an." Buckingham, for instance, might mean "the ham of the beech-woods." "Tun" was found as a Scandinavian as well as a Saxon form—for instance, in "Sigstana"; so Ulfarstun might be Norse in both its elements. Place-names altered so completely, that in trying to trace and account for them it was highly necessary to consult the oldest form, otherwise derivations are sure to be false. No one, for instance, would suppose that Harrietham in Kent was derived from a man's name, yet Herigardesham is the oldest form of it. He thought the Ordnance surveyors and their renderings of local pronunciation were responsible for many misleading forms and false derivations. The explanation of Rother as "trout-water" was very interesting, and would account for many similar names in various parts. With regard to the two forms "beck" and "leek," the latter was found in the Thames-valley—for instance, in the name Pimlico, and in Letchmere on the opposite bank. With regard to sculptured stones, he might remark that in the Buider for the current week a stone at Bakewell, which had hitherto been considered to be a Christian monument, was shown to be Scandinavian, and with its figures of horses was connected with the worship of Odin. He should like to hear whether Mr. Collingwood could identify Agmondesham (now Amersham) in the Thames-valley with the chieftain Agmund, who had left his traces in Lancashire.—Mr. Collingwood replied, that as there seemed to be at least one other Agmund known as leader of Vikings in the South of England, there was no need to connect the Agmund of the Lancashire settlement with the Thames-valley. With regard to "ham" and "ton," his point was that both might be Norse, though usually indicating Saxon and Anglian settlements respectively. Aldingham was shown by archaeologists like Chancellor Ferguson to be an Anglo-Saxon burh, and its name was taken to be the "home of the Aldings," in agreement with a great series of names in "-ingham" and "-ington." But "ham" or "ton," occurring in a distinctly Norse context, might be Norse, and nothing else. We know from history that the Norsemen were an eminently versatile race, readily adopting the customs and identifying themselves with the people among whom they settled. In France they became Frenchmen and in a generation or two even lost their own tongue; in England they became English, and he thought it quite conceivable that they should adopt the Anglian ways of forming names of places and join the Anglian termination to a name of Scandinavian origin, so that Ulfar, a Norseman, settling near the Anglian Pennington, &c., might call his place Ulfars-tún.—Mr. E. H. Beverstock said that at Wantage in Berkshire there was a place called the Ham or, in old documents, Hame. There is also a village of the same name in Wiltshire, four miles from Hungerford, Berkshire, and other Hams in Essex, Kent, Somerset, Surrey, and Sussex. Antiquaries had endeavoured to account for the name, but, so far as he knew, its meaning had never been traced. His own name occurred as that of a village in Wiltshire, and appeared in Domesday as Babes-toche—i.e., Babe's or Child's Dowry; while to show how names got corrupted, he might instance Ducksfoot-lane, leading out of Cornhill, which, after much search, he had found to originate in Duke's Foot-lane, so named because the alley originally led to the Duke of Suffolk's town house, which stood hard by in Suffolk-lane. He was very grateful to Mr. Collingwood, not only for his lecture, but also for the pleasure he had derived from "Thorstein of the Mere," the Lakeland saga, in which the lecturer had embodied much of the result of his study of the early history of the district.—Dr. Jón Stefánsson said he wished to move the vote of thanks which was certainly due to Mr. Collingwood for coming over three hundred miles to give the club his most scholarly lecture. Would that we could have similar ones on Northumberland, Yorkshire, and other Scandinavian counties! A great quarrel existed some years ago between the historians of Denmark and those of Norway as to the word "beck." The Danes claimed it as Danish, and Swedish scholars supported them; but the question could not be regarded as settled. "Beo" was a common termination in Normandy; and on the strength of this the Danes argued that Normandy was largely colonised from Denmark. As to "tun," it occurred in Sweden, and was found occasionally in Iceland; but it is fair to conclude that, speaking generally, it is a Saxon termination. The area of Norse settlement in England was very much widened by the conclusions of the lecturer; and it was hardly too much to say that the history of England would have to be largely re-written when nearly one half of the country was found to be Scandinavian.—Mr. A. W. Johnston, in seconding the vote of thanks, said he wished to include in it Mr. E. G. Pope, who had so kindly lent and worked the magic-lantern by which the lecture was illustrated.—The lecturer in reply said that, owing to the lateness of the hour, he would only remark that in some Danish parts of England "beck" was not found, while in the Lake-district the Norse test-words predominated.

FINE ART.

SOME BOOKS ON ARCHAEOLOGY.

Prehistoric Man in Ayrshire. By John Smith. (Elliot Stock.) This is in substance an excellent book, though it contains a good deal that shows that the author is not a regularly educated scholar. There are few counties that can show such an abundance of well-preserved monuments of remote antiquity as Ayrshire. The map prefixed to this volume indicates the sites of some hundreds of ancient forts, tumuli, cromlechs, and other remains of the kind, which Mr. Smith has described from laborious personal investigation, in most cases giving accurate measurements. The author's own drawings of the monuments and the objects found in them are painfully inartistic, and he would have done well to have had them put into shape by some skilled hand. For the purpose of conveying information, they are no doubt fairly adequate; but their crudity of execution contrasts oddly with the finish of those of the illustrations which are reproduced from other works. Mr. Smith gives, though without laying much stress on them, a considerable number of unscientific etymologies of place names; and he appears to believe in the existence of "Baal-altars" in Britain, which is somewhat surprising in so intelligent a writer. The statement that "on Ptolemy's map the course of the Doon is given with great exactness" is a curious but easily explicable mistake. Mr. Smith makes no attempt at literary style, and now and then uses idioms that might puzzle Southern readers; but in general he contrives to make his meaning clear without any waste of words. As a contribution to archaeological knowledge, the book deserves to rank far above many more pretentious works.

MISS MARGARET STOKES has printed, for private circulation only, a handsome quarto pamphlet, which she modestly entitles Notes on the Cross of Cong. The cross in question, apart from its intrinsic beauty, is of special interest because of its history. It bears five lines of inscription, in Latin and Irish, attesting that it was made by one Maelsu O'Eahan, when Turlough O'Connor was King of Connaught, and Muiredach O'Duffy was archbishop; and that it enshrines the cross on which the founder of the world suffered. Now, the Annals of Misfallen record, at the year 1123, that "a bit of the true cross came into Ireland, and was enshrined at Roscommon by Turlough O'Connor." From the church of Tuam it passed to the Augustinian Abbey of Cong; and early in the present century it was in the possession of the last mitred abbot. There it was seen by Petrie, and acquired for the museum of the Royal Irish Academy, of which it now forms one of the most valued treasures. It has been described before; but Miss Stokes is able to show that its nearest analogue is the Anglo-Saxon cross at Saints Gudule and Michael, in Brussels, on which Prof. Logeman was the first to discover—and publish in the ACADEMY—an Anglo-Saxon inscription. She also points out that the style of decoration indicates a development on the archaic art of Ireland, probably under French influence; and that this influence is chiefly to be seen in the interlaced gold filigree work, which is fastened by rivets to the copper plates beneath. The frame of the cross is of oak, and so also, apparently, is the relic which it enshrines. The monograph is illustrated with two fine coloured plates, reproduced from drawings by Miss Stokes herself—though we observe with regret that, in the country of Messrs. Marcus Ward, the work of chromo-lithography has had to be done in Germany.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE elevation of Sir Frederic Leighton to the peerage has been received, alike in general and artistic circles, with the most complete satisfaction. For eighteen years already has Sir Frederic presided with extreme skill and unerring reasonableness over the Academic body; and for twice as many years as that has he been acknowledged to be one of the worthiest and most important of English painters. The honour has been richly deserved by its recipient, and it is as much an honour to the Peerage as to the President of the Academy.

THE annual winter exhibition at Burlington House of works by Old Masters and Deceased British Artists will open to the public next week. The private view is fixed for to-day (Saturday).

ON Monday next, Mr. W. B. Richmond will deliver his inaugural lecture as the new professor of painting at the Royal Academy. The subject of his course of five lectures, to be delivered subsequently on Thursdays and Mondays, is "The Sixtine Chapel: Michael Angelo."

ANOTHER change is announced in the mode of publication of the Portfolio. The system of issuing monographs on artistic subjects, as for the last two years, will be continued; but, in view of practical difficulties, it has been decided that these monographs shall appear at quarterly instead of monthly intervals. At the same time their size will be increased to upwards of 100 pages, with four plates and at least thirty other important illustrations. In addition, it is proposed to issue special summer and Christmas numbers, making six in all during the year. The subject of the first of the new series, to appear on January 15, will be "The Pictures of Charles I.," described by Mr. Claude Phillips, with illustrations from Windsor, Hampton Court, the Louvre, and other continental galleries. The number for April will be devoted to the work of Mr. John La Farge, the American designer of decorations for churches and houses, whose drawings were exhibited in Paris last spring. Later on Mr. Humphry Ward will write on the Dulwich Gallery, Mr. A. W. Hunt on Turner in Switzerland, and Mr. Walter Armstrong on Velasquez. The subject of the summer number, to be written by Dr. Richard Garnett, will be "Richmond-on-Thames," with numerous illustrations.

THE lectures which Mr. William Sharp delivered at University Hall, Edinburgh, during last autumn, will be published shortly by Messrs. Patrick Geddes & Colleagues, under the title of The Ideals of Art.

THERE is on view, during January, at the Dudley Gallery, Piccadilly, a "landscape exhibition" of works by Messrs. R. W. Allan, James S. Hill, T. Hope McLachlan, A. D. Peppercorn, Leslie Thomson, and E. A. Waterlow.

THE late Miss Anna Jane Perceval has bequeathed to the National Portrait Gallery a portrait, by Joseph, of her grandfather, the Right Hon. Spencer Perceval, who was assassinated when Prime Minister in 1812. We believe that the National Portrait Gallery already possesses a portrait of him, which is said to have been painted from a mask taken after death by Nollekens.

THE STAGE.

WE record with regret the death of Lady Gregory—the famous Mrs. Stirling—who, had she lived a few months longer, would have completed her eightieth year. It is scarcely necessary to say that it was but as an exponent of the parts technically known as "first old women" that Mrs. Stirling was known to the present generation. Yet not longer than about thirty years ago, in a revival of "Masks and Faces" at the Adelphi, she sustained that leading young woman's character of Peg Woffington which she had, if our impression is accurate, been the first to create. Very clever she undoubtedly was in it. But it is to be doubted whether in the parts of young women Mrs. Stirling, even fifty years ago, was as satisfactory and convincing as she was in the parts of the elderly. The expression of sentiment was certainly not her peculiar gift, whereas in later life she developed extraordinary qualities as an observant portrayer of more or less comical old age. Her Martha in "Faust," at the Lyceum, a dozen of years ago—or was it less?—was very full flavoured. Her Nurse in "Romeo and Juliet," of about the same period, was a performance of exceeding merit. She filled the stage in that character. And it may with safety be said that never in the heyday of womanhood could she have acted better. But of course there are few playgoers now living who remember the performance of Mrs. Stirling's youth, when, having made her début at an East London theatre, she passed on to the Haymarket, to Drury Lane, and to the Adelphi. Some dozen years ago—and, for all we know to the contrary, she may have kept up the practice much later—Mrs. Stirling was wont to receive dramatic pupils. We have been informed by one of these young ladies that in giving her lessons she rarely interfered with any suggestion of details. These she left to smaller and more academic folk. Stationing herself at the further end of the apartment in which the practice was held, the ripe comedian of old time would—so it is averred to us—content herself with almost a single criticism upon the effort of the beginner. "Bigger, my dear! bigger!" she was accustomed to shout. This criticism was by some considered inadequate. But the pith of the matter was there. Mrs. Stirling had to deal generally with ladylike amateurs. They are nearly always fearful of anything approaching a broad and strong effect; they do not even aim at such an effect as is compassed continually by the great art of Mrs. Kendal. Under these circumstances, no advice can possibly have been sounder than the admirable Mrs. Stirling's, or more complete. And "Bigger, my dear! bigger!" may be accepted as the whole doctrine of righteousness for the stage-struck young girl.

IN the matter of pantomimes, while other people have been to Drury Lane, we have ourselves had the enterprise to go to an East End, or at least a suburban, theatre. It was so much more unusual. And there is nothing like the East End, or even a suburb, for really enjoying itself. The whole house there enjoys itself as much as does the gallery of a West End playhouse. Not that it is the same class of playgoer by any means. In an outlying theatre all classes are represented below the upper middle; and though, as Mr. Sickert's picture-title says, "the boy I love" may be "in the gallery," the audience, as a whole, consists by no means of gamin and work-girl. The ordinary West End playgoer is very darkened about this sort of thing. He imagines that if he goes he will get a stall for sixpence, and will have to take care of his watch. This is pure delusion—as we have found by experience. Nothing can be better behaved than the audience: nothing can better combine geniality with courtesy. And as for the stalls, they will cost, at an average outlying playhouse, half-a-crown. The theatre we chose was Stratford, where there already exists a house which compares favourably with one or two still left in the West End, and where they are building a house which is to be half as large again as the Grand at Islington. At the Theatre Royal, Stratford, "Little Red Riding Hood" is the piece. It is written very briskly, is full of apropos allusions, and, better than that, is full of good old-fashioned "business," which makes the house fairly roar. The parts are too many for us to enumerate all of them. Hardly one is played weakly; and so great is the encouragement given to the manager in the pantomime season that he can afford, and does afford, to get several parts played in a way that would not discredit a West End house. Thus the Fairy Queen is played by a lady who makes excellent use of a very good singing voice. Miss Fredericks plays and looks capital as the juvenile hero. Miss Hasto, as Little Red Riding Hood, is full of intelligence in all that she acts, and of grace and vivacity in all that she dances. The parts of the Grandmother and the Wolf—the latter by Mr. King, we believe—naturally afford keen amusement. The scene in which the Wolf is substituted for the Grandmother in the ancestral bedstead is one of the funniest we have seen for some time.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

History of English Music. By Henry Davey. (Curwen.)

IN his preface the author explains how, after having written his book, study of fresh material modified his opinions, and necessitated the re-writing of many a page. There is, however, one sentence which probably was never altered; for we find it, or words to similar effect, many times in the course of the book. This sentence, the first of the first chapter, runs thus: "The art of musical composition is an English invention." Further on the inventor is named—John Dunstable. Such statements are unscientific. We now speak of the evolution, not the invention of music. Further, by an appeal to history, it can easily be shown that there were musical compositions before the days of Dunstable. Mr. Davey, indeed, acknowledges such a one written nearly two centuries before his "inventor"—namely, the celebrated Rota, "Sumer is icumen in"; but he seems almost to look upon that wonderful piece of music as having fallen by chance from heaven. Again, on p. 51 our author talks about a "school of musicians which invented the art of musical composition," and of that school he declares Dunstable to have been chief. On the following page we are informed that, owing to the lack of older music, we do not know exactly what Dunstable invented. Like the poet, Mr. Davey was in search of a hero; and having found one, and an Englishman to boot, he has tried, even though facts failed, to make the most of him. The few records of Dunstable show him to have been an eminent musician; yet he owed far more to his predecessors than Mr. Davey would have us believe.

Before noticing one or two other matters, let us turn to what is perhaps the most valuable chapter of the volume—that in which statements made by certain historians with regard to the Puritans are, to our thinking, successfully refuted. The Puritans did remove organs from the churches, and did cause the choir-books of some cathedrals to be destroyed, and, further, closed the theatres; but, says Mr. Davey, "that music was forbidden [by them], or even discouraged, is not true." His description of Cromwell's taste, nay, enthusiasm, for music; his quotation of passages from Milton's Areopagitica, together with the poet's well-known love of the art; his extracts from the Pilgrim's Progress and Eccles's dialogue tract of 1667—these and other references to the doings and sayings of Puritans of high and low degree alike seem to dispose of Macaulay's statement that they were averse to all kinds of art and science. Mr. Davey makes out a strong case; and the closing sentence of the chapter, "I distinctly, and in the most unequivocal words, challenge any one to answer me," was unnecessary.

Johannes de Garlandia, who wrote on the theory of music in the thirteenth century, is spoken of as English. According to some authorities he was a Frenchman. We have his own statement that he was born in England; but that of itself does not constitute him an Englishman.

The account of Locke's Melothesia is somewhat meagre. Mention is made of an unsigned piece headed "Charity." This—perhaps the name of the melody—is not of prime importance. There are other titles in the volume, such as Jig-Almain (p. 66), about which a word of explanation would have been welcome. Again, from our author's description it is not quite clear whether Locke is included in the "various composers" who are said to have contributed music to the collection. Mr. Davey states that "at the end are six organ pieces by Locke," but, in addition, there are five Lessons from his pen. "Mr. John Banister" figures among the "various composers"; and that fact might, at any rate, have been mentioned when later on the collections are quoted in which pieces by that composer are to be found.

Mr. Davey dwells with just pride on the Shaksperian age, which "saw the climax of English music," and on Purcell, "the man who more than any other English musician deserves the appellation genius." One turns, therefore, somewhat dubiously to the last chapter, headed "The Nineteenth Century," to see what he will say about our living composers. Of these he remarks that, "especially if still young or in middle life, they have not yet finished their work; and even what they have done cannot be seen in its true perspective by anybody." Handel, it will be remembered, composed some of his finest music between the age of sixty and seventy; Haydn was long past middle life before he wrote the "London Symphonies," which are generally regarded as his best; and Wagner was nearly seventy before he had finished his work. Our author, however, in spite of the cautious remark quoted above, declares of Doctors Parry, Stanford, and Mackenzie that none "has invented an original style." If this be true, these worthy doctors may console themselves; they have yet time to "invent" a style. Our author has "little hope that a genius will arise in future"; for he believes "the Teutonic nations have apparently said all they have to say." He may be right; and yet one cannot but feel that it is one of those things which had better have been left unsaid. English art needs all possible encouragement.

Mr. Davey's book shows skill and enthusiasm; while the research, of which it gives proof on nearly every page, will make it of the highest value as a work of reference. This history of English music is, however, crowded with dates and names of little interest, so that at times the tracing of it becomes difficult. Such things are useful to the student and historian, both of whom will thank our author for the material which he has collected; for readers, however, who wish to follow generally the rise and development—and, taking Mr. Davey as guide, we may perhaps add, decline—of English music, man details might have been spared, or rather have been embodied in notes, separate chapters, or appendices. In one or two instances the information seems actually incomplete. Why, for example, is there mention of three works by foreigners (Mendelssohn, Gounod, Dvorák) originally written for the Birmingham Festival, and none of the English works produced there? The three named may be the most interesting; but for the task which our historian set himself they are certainly not the most important.

MUSIC NOTES.

AT the last Saturday Popular Concert before Christmas Herr Reisenauer played Schubert's Fantasia in C (Op. 16). This fine work offers to virtuosi every opportunity of displaying their technical powers; with these, however, they are, apparently, not satisfied. Some of the additions made by Reisenauer were commonplace, while the reduplication of the theme-notes at the opening of the Finale merely weakened what followed: it was an effect of anti-climax. There were many fine points in his rendering of the music, yet, judged by the highest standard, it missed the mark. The pianist afterwards played the Krentzer Sonata with Señor Arbos; but the work did not appear to have been properly rehearsed. The artistic singing of Miss Boye in songs by Gluck, Schubert, and Schumann deserves note. On the following Monday evening MM. Rosenthal and Piatti gave an excellent performance of Saint-Saëns' interesting, if unequal, Sonata in C minor (Op. 32). Herr Rosenthal played as solo Beethoven's "Appassionata" Sonata. From a technical point of view the reading was admirable; but the grandeur of the Allegro and the beauty of the Andante were not fully revealed. It is only fair to add that the pianist was loudly applauded and encoored. Miss Thudichum sang some charming songs by B. Godard.

MESSRS. BELL'S PUBLICATIONS.

THE ONLY AUTHORISED & COMPLETE "WEBSTER." WEBSTER'S INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY.

2,118 Pages, 3,500 Illustrations.

Medium 4to, cloth, £1 11s. 6d.; half-calf, £2 2s.; half-Russia, £2 5s.; calf, £2 8s. Or, in 2 vols., cloth, £1 14s.

In addition to the Dictionary of Words, with their pronunciation, alternative spellings, etymology, and various meanings, illustrated by quotations and numerous woodcuts, there are several valuable appendices, comprising:—

A Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World; Vocabularies of Scripture, Greek, Latin, and English Proper Names; a Dictionary of the Noted Names of Fiction; a Brief History of the English Language; a Dictionary of Foreign Quotations, Words, Phrases, Proverbs, &c.; a Biographical Dictionary with 10,000 Names, &c., &c.

The DAILY CHRONICLE says:—
"A most ample, trustworthy, and cheap lexicon, not excelled for the purposes of general use by any other one-volume dictionary of the language..... There does not exist, so far as we are aware, any purely English lexicon of similar extent, comprehensiveness, and accuracy, within the compass of a single manageable volume."

The GUARDIAN says:—
"We believe that, all things considered, this will be found to be the best existing English dictionary in one volume. We do not know of any work similar in size and price which can approach it in completeness of vocabulary, variety of information, and general usefulness."

The DAILY TELEGRAPH says:—
"A magnificent edition of Webster's immortal dictionary."

The STANDARD says:—
"Line by line, word by word, detail by detail, this latest revision bears ample testimony to the thoroughness and completeness of the labour which during the past ten years has been spent upon the successful edition of 1864."

The JOURNAL OF EDUCATION says:—
"We have turned out some hundred words wherein we have found the ordinary dictionaries defective, and in over ninety per cent. of these 'Webster' has satisfied us."

The MORNING POST says:—
"The information given in this admirable dictionary has been brought up to date, and the appendix of illustrations, &c., is an excellent feature of the work."

The Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE'S PRIVATE SECRETARY writes:—
"On a first inspection Mr. Gladstone is favourably impressed with the great value of the present edition."

Sir S. A. BLACKWOOD, K.C.B., Secretary to the Post Office, says:—
"The work has been in general use throughout the Department as a standard dictionary for many years past."

Professor MAX MULLER, Prof. of Comp. Philology, Oxford, says:—

"There are few books I know so well as Webster's Dictionary. I have used it for more than 40 years, and I may say I have learnt English from it. It was recommended to me by Bunsen. I remembered well when I asked him which he considered the best English dictionary, he laughed and said, 'The best English dictionary is the American dictionary by Webster.'..... I see the new edition is not only enlarged, but improved, more particularly in what was its weak point, the etymologies."

Prof. DOWDEN, Prof. of English Literature, Dublin University, says:—

The Amazing Marriage. By George Meredith. In 2 vols. (Constable.)

THERE are certain books which are independent of contemporary criticism, because they are above it. Most of the works that come in the way of the reviewer, while they may move his admiration, his wrath, or his weariness, are yet obviously enough the production of men of like passions with himself, and so fair game for the young, light-hearted masters of the pen. It is only in a rare volume here and there that one has the chance to encounter the large utterance of the early gods, and to approach a book of such transcendent power, sympathy, and insight that in its presence criticism seems to be an impertinence, while the mere reading of it is a liberal education in the art of life. And when one has that happiness in the present generation, it is a safe wager that twice out of three times the name on the title-page will be that of Mr. George Meredith.

The Amazing Marriage affords no exception to this rule. There is only one man living who could criticise it adequately, and he, as it happens, wrote it. The ordinary critic has to turn "descriptive reporter" for the nonce. Then he finds that it is, like almost all Mr. Meredith's books, devoted to the narration of an episode

"In that great duel of Sox, that ancient strife, Which is the very central fact of life."

The episode in question reminds one in certain respects of Diana of the Crossways and of Lord Ormont and his Aminta. The "central fact" of it is the development of a woman's character by reason of the ill-usage that she experiences from the man who should have loved her. Like Browning, Mr. Meredith is chiefly interested, here as in almost all his works, in "the development of a soul." He might say, with Keats, to his reader, "Call the world, if you please, 'the Vale of Soul-making.' Then you will find out the use of the world." So we are invited by his incomparable art to consider the progress in soul of a man and woman, Lord Fleetwood and Carinthia Jane Kirby, under the burning sunshine and heavy showers of life. Carinthia herself, the heroine of "the amazing marriage," is one more of those noble pieces of portraiture such as no English novelist before Mr. Meredith has ever achieved. "She was a warrior woman, Life her sword, Death her target, never to be put to shame, unconquerable." This sense of seriousness and strength, her hereditary right, is the keynote of her story. It fell to her lot, as most readers now know, to be mated with one of the young men who have not learnt "that life is no longer a game when they have a woman for partner in the match." Lord Fleetwood "was born with suspicion of the sex. Poetry decorated women, he said, to lime and drag men in the foulest ruts of prose." He cast eye on Carinthia out of spite at the insensibility of "the golden Riette," and married her but to "fling the world at her," as Lord Ormont in a different spirit had done with Aminta. But Carinthia was no meek-spirited Griselda to play at patience, nor yet one of "the inexplicable sex" whose action under insult can never be predicted. She is a daughter of the mountains as well as of the Old Buccaneer, dowered with the freshness, sincerity, and courage that come from such a double parentage. Hence arises a noble opportunity for the treatment, in Mr. Meredith's best style, of Carinthia's growth from curious, impressionable girlhood into noble, steel-fibred womanhood. Carinthia's figure must be placed loftily among the many portraits of "fair and desirable women" that Mr. Meredith's creative brain and subtly shaping hand have already given to a grateful world.

The other striking creation in the book is the character of Lord Fleetwood. This gentleman is compact of those nice shades and subtle elements that Mr. Meredith mingles in so masterly a fashion. Like Sir Willoughby and Wilfred Pole, with both of whom he has a touch in common, Lord Fleetwood is a captivating though by no means a great man. His true nature may be most easily guessed from his two conflicting, but equally genuine, friendships, for the Catholic Lord Feltre, and the humanist Gower Woodseer. He is, you are told repeatedly, "the wealthiest nobleman in all England." "He is accustomed to buy men and women," urges Riette, in her fine "lyrical cry" at the end of the book. There is the weak spot—the touch of the "beast of prey." You see that he has noble instincts by his sincere affection for Woodseer, who brings him into contact with the work-a-day world of the brown earth; by his no less sincere leaning to Feltre, Woodseer's antipathetic opposite, who points an ascetic finger to the Church. But the training in luxury, the flattering of Sir Pandarus, have spoilt it all; and he comes in contact with the noblest of women only to fulfil his and her destiny by dashing her aside and learning her worthiness too late. Feltre and Woodseer, his foils, are comparatively simple. The complexity of Lord Fleetwood's character is fascinating in the extreme.

The style of the book is beyond all praise. Mr. Meredith at one time (for it is permitted to see spots even on the sun) showed a tendency to develop certain of those mannerisms which come almost inevitably with the years to a great master of language. In his two latest books he has achieved the feat that proved too much for Browning or Mr. Ruskin, Carlyle or Thackeray, and has returned to the simplicity of his earlier manner, touched with a depth of thought and a mellowness of sympathy that only the ripening years can be supposed to bring. There is nothing here quite in the glorious poetic style of Ferdinand and Miranda or By Wilming Weir, but there is at least one chapter that will linger as fondly in the mind's ear as either of those perfect idylls of youth. One quotation from it must be made for affection, if not to give an idea of the whole. Carinthia and her brother have just left their Tyrol home for the last time.

"She did not look back. The house came swimming and plunging after her, like a spectral ship on big seas, and her father and mother lived and died in her breast; and now they were strong, consulting, chatting, laughing, caressing; now still and white, caught by a vapour that dived away with them either to right or left, but always with the same suddenness, leaving her to question herself whether she existed, for more of life seemed to be with their mystery than with her speculations. The phantom ring of mist enclosing for miles the invariable low-sweeping dark spruce-fir kept her thoughts on them as close as the shroud. She walked fast, but scarcely felt that she was moving. Near midday the haunted circle widened; rocks were loosely folded in it, and heads of trees, whose round intervolving roots grasped the yellow roadside soil; the mists shook like a curtain, and partly opened and displayed a tapestry-landscape, roughly worked, of woollen crag and castle and suggested glen, threaded waters, very prominent foreground, Autumn flowers on banks; a predominant atmospheric greyness. The sun threw a shaft, liquid instead of burning, as we see his beams beneath a wave; and then the mists narrowed again, boiled up the valleys and streams above the mountain, curled and flew, and were Python coils pierced by brighter arrows of the sun. A spot of blue signalled his victory above.

"To look at it was to fancy they had been walking under water and had now risen to the surface. Carinthia's mind stepped out of the chamber of death."

This "intervolving" of the landscape with the mind of a person is peculiarly characteristic of Mr. Meredith, as it is of serious life.

The background in which the main plot is set argues an opulence of fancy and a ripe knowledge of humanity to which only the very greatest of our writers ever rise. One especially recalls the figures of "the golden Riette," the laughing, light-hearted beauty whose love for Chillon is the only element of gravity in her nature; of the Countess Iivia, who took excitement "as the nymph of the stream her native wave, and swam on the flood with expansive languor, happy to have the master passions about her"; of the girl Madge, who "could be twisted to laugh at herself, just a little. Now the young woman who can do that has already jumped the hedge into the high road of philosophy, and may become a philosopher's mate in its by-ways, where the minute discoveries are the notable treasures." All the Fleetwood circle are sketched with the hand of a master. But perhaps the most remarkable of all the minor characters is that of the roving philosopher, Gower Woodseer, who shares the taste of Vernon Whitford for country walks and plain speaking, but has a fund of wit and philosophy that are all his own, though some have curiously taken for granted that they must be copied from a real human being whose similar possessions are now known to all of us. Woodseer's social creed, indeed, is happily expressed in a song of Mr. Stevenson's that has just been published :

"Give to me the life I love,
Let the lave go by me,
Give the jolly heaven above,
And the by-way nigh me.
Bed in the bush with stars to see,
Bread I dip in the river—
'There's the life for a man like me,
There's the life for ever !"

The spirit of "An Apology for Idlers" and "Travels with a Donkey," too, is strong in Woodseer.

"I put on my hat one day," he says, "and walked into the country. My college fellows were hawkers, tinkers, tramps and ploughmen, choughs and crows. A volume of our poets and a history of philosophy composed my library. I had hardly any money, so I learnt how to idle inexpensively—a good first lesson. We're at the bottom of the world when we take to the road ; we see men as they were in the beginning—not so eager for harness till they get acquainted with hunger, as I did, and studied to myself the old animal having his head pushed into the collar to earn a feed of corn."

Mr. Stevenson has more than once put on record his immense and laudable admiration for the author of The Egoist ; and this sketch is a new proof, if one were needed, of the essential sympathy that existed between the minds of the greater writer and the lesser. Mr. Meredith might have been our earlier Stevenson, if he had not been our later Shakspeare. I use the phrase advisedly. Exaggeration, either of praise or blame, is a hateful thing, although it is far too common nowadays. But when one casts back through our literature for a parallel to the author of Richard Feverel and The Egoist, Rhoda Fleming and Sandra Belloni, where is one to find it save in the author of "As You Like It" and "Hamlet" and "King Lear" ? At any rate, without pushing the parallel askew, one may safely assert that no man since Shakspeare has created such fair, human, and red-blooded women as Mr. Meredith. Warm-hearted Sandra, brave Rose Jocelyn, lively Diana, enchanting Peggy Waring, peerless Clara Middleton, grave-eyed Aminta—do not the very names hold out a promise of delight never to be unfulfilled for the wise reader ? So, too, Bessy Berry, the Countess, that Irishwoman, Mrs. Chump, and Mrs. Pagnell, who rhymed with spaniel, testify to the possession of that kindly and lambent humour which makes a perennial joy out of the most common-place of things. Carinthia herself is fully worthy to take place beside the finest of these "Shaksperian women," as someone has happily called them. And the two worthy volumes in which her sober and simple, yet powerful, story is unfolded with such admirable skill are a fresh and most welcome contribution to that great Handbook of Humanity which is Mr. Meredith's supremely valuable gift to the literature of the world.

The History of the Foreign Policy of Great Britain. By Montagu Burrows, Chichele Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. (Blackwoods.)

PROF. BURROWS informs us in his preface that "the main purpose of this work has been to show the continuity, the continuous development, of British foreign policy. Now and again distorted, or even reversed, by dynastic interests, by careless diplomacy, by erratic statesmanship, by ecclesiastical dissensions, by foreign rivalry, by stress of circumstance, it has always reverted—as it ever will revert—to the course prescribed by nature and approved by experience."

There was certainly room for a work treating in a concise form of the foreign relations of Great Britain, and no one can deny that Prof. Burrows has many qualifications for the task. His work shows both ability and knowledge of the subject, and is written in a clear and interesting style. It is, however, evidently pervaded from first to last by a particular theory as to the right foreign policy of England, which the author holds very strongly. It would be absurd to complain of him for this ; but it should be distinctly understood that he writes as an advocate, and not as an impartial judge. At times, too, it must be said, he shows rather too great a tendency to put forward his own views as if they were almost universally accepted, which, on many points, is very far from being the case.

Prof. Burrows is a decided Imperialist, we might almost say Chauvinist, and his Imperialism is rather of the old school than the new. He is not content to dwell merely on the position of England as a colonial and oceanic power : he would have her also assert herself as a vigorous factor in European affairs. He is a devout believer in the old doctrine of the balance of power. This system, he tells us, was "no artificial product of a corrupt age—bad in initiation, futile in execution, and fatal in its legacy to subsequent ages ; and this has been in recent years the way in which it has been described—but the result of self-sacrificing and far-seeing public spirit, honourable to those nations and sovereigns who threw themselves into the ranks of its supporters, and, in the long run, beneficial to all their best interests."

Our author certainly seems to antedate the adoption of the theory of the balance as a motive power in English policy, when he attributes it to Henry VII. instead of to Henry VIII. and Wolsey. It may be questioned, too, whether he is not claiming a great deal too much for Elizabeth, when he credits her with having advanced the doctrine "to the dignity of a scientific system." His view of the Queen's policy is strikingly contrasted with that of Motley, who describes it as being "what politically and personally she loved best—a course of barren coquetry." Our author seems to regard this very coquetry as a proof of wisdom :

"Nor did she forget that, being a woman, she had resources which gave her a peculiar advantage ; and by encouraging different suitors at different times, as policy dictated, she accomplished what armies and navies would have failed at that time to do."

Prof. Burrows seems to be one of those who think it shows a want of patriotism to admit that their country can ever have been in the wrong. At least he writes as if the extension of the British empire was an object good enough to vindicate all wars which contributed to this result. He can even say of the infamous Dutch War in Charles II.'s reign that, "in spite of French intrigues and English false pretences, there was no prospect of the growth in ships, colonies, and commerce on which the English had long set their hearts till the Dutch were out of the way." This is surely a standard of international morality worthy of Napoleon himself.

Our author follows some other recent writers in vindicating the substantial justice of the Spanish War of 1739, and considers that Walpole, far from being to blame for weakly yielding to an unreasonable popular clamour, deserves the severest censure for having put up so long with the outrages of the Spaniards on English commerce. There is no doubt a good deal more to be said in defence of this war than used to be thought ; and to represent it as an utterly unprovoked aggression on the English side is as unreasonable as the similar contention concerning the French War in the fourteenth century. Both assertions ought to vanish from the pages of school books, where they are still sometimes found. The unmeasured denunciation, however, which Prof. Burrows heaps upon Walpole's peace policy is as far from the truth as the undiluted panegyric of Mr. John Morley. We should probably form a tolerably accurate judgment of the matter by striking a balance between the two extremes.

As we might anticipate, the author bestows the most unquestioned approval on the policy of Pitt in the French Revolution war, and is full of scorn for all who presume to question the wisdom of this great saint of modern Toryism. Such presumptuous heretics are lectured in a style which strikes us as a less forcible imitation of the lively abuse which Mommsen pours on the heads of all who refuse to bend in humble adoration before the image of Roman Caesarism. Theirs, we are assured, is only "the language of party spirit, of peace at any price, of a mock liberality, shaping a theory for the past in accordance with the views of subsequent popular writers, and totally opposed to the sentiments which had animated the British nation during the mighty struggle."

Prof. Burrows appears very confident that these views "no longer predominate," and attributes the change "not a little to particular books, such as Von Sybel's French Revolution." Of this writer, whom English assailants of the French Revolution have eagerly striven to place on a pedestal of commanding authority, it may be said, in the words which Sir James Stephen very rightly applied to James Mill, that by reason of his excessive dryness, and the harshness with which he judges almost everyone who figures in his pages, he has acquired a reputation for accuracy and impartiality which is by no means deserved. No one who has read his works can fail to see that he writes throughout in the spirit of a thorough Prussian martinet of the Bismarckian school, and to expect from him any understanding or fair judgment of French revolutionary leaders would be like looking for grapes from thorns. He might serve as a model for the German professor in one of Jules Verne's romances, who wrote an essay on the topic, "Why are all Frenchmen affected with different degrees of hereditary degeneracy?" These words, indeed, would form no inapt summary of the spirit which pervades every part of Sybel's writings. Almost the only Frenchman for whom he has the least word of approval is the wretched traitor Dumouriez. It is true that he may find a match in the French historian Taine, who, like his German co-adjutor in the task of systematic denigration, has been loudly acclaimed as an oracle by anti-revolutionary writers on this side of the Channel. Both of them, in fact, under an affected philosophical mask, are simply bitter, and by no means scrupulous, advocates; and to set up either of them as impartial judges of the revolutionary period is many degrees more preposterous than it would be to place implicit confidence in Gibbon's representations of early Christianity.

With all his glorification of the war, Prof. Burrows fails to give an accurate account of the causes which led to its outbreak. It is certainly not correct to say that the French "overran and annexed Holland, and, on the remonstrance of the British minister, declared war." It would seem as if the author imagines that the French invasion of Holland took place in 1793 instead of 1795, unless, indeed, "Holland" is a misprint for "Belgium." The actual technical ground of dispute between the two countries was the conduct of the French in throwing open the navigation of the Scheldt, which had been closed in the interest of the Dutch. It will hardly be contended now that to maintain such a restriction on commerce was a just or sufficient ground of hostilities; and, in fact, Burke and most of the eager English advocates of the war utterly ridiculed the notion of its being a war about the Scheldt. They eulogised it as a crusade against "French principles"; and such, notwithstanding Pitt's unwillingness at the outset to embark on this course, it did substantially become. And without justifying all the acts on the French side which preceded the struggle, many, Prof. Burrows notwithstanding, will still be found to endorse the opinion of Macaulay, that the war against the coalition was for France "at first a defensive war, and, therefore, a just war."

Our author's account of the foreign policy of England during the present century is brief and fair on the whole.

There are one or two expressions in different parts of the book which are certainly open to exception. We may hope that it is a mere slip of the pen when a university professor of history talks of an "Austrian empire" in the eighteenth century; but the blunder certainly ought to be corrected. We can imagine what a late distinguished colleague of the author would have said to a description of Napoleon as "the modern Charlemagne." Possibly it may only be intended to indicate the model which Bonaparte did, no doubt to some extent, set before himself; but it ought to be shown how utterly spurious the imitation was. Still more objectionable is the reference to the concert of the Great Powers as "a sort of Amphictyonic Council." This is, in fact, only one degree less absurd than the newspaper phrase of the "European Arcopagus."

Can Prof. Burrows really be ignorant that, in the unanimous opinion of all modern authorities on Greek history, the Amphictyonic Council was a purely religious body, and hardly ever pretended to any political functions at all, except during a brief period, when it was made the instrument of Macedonian aggression?

R. SEYMOUR LONG.

Essays. By Arthur Christopher Benson, of Eton College. (Heinemann.)

It is rare nowadays to light upon a group of reprinted essays of which every page may be said to exhibit, in its excellence alike of substance and style, ample warrant for its republication. So much, however, may, we venture to think, be truthfully affirmed of the volume before us. Only a very small portion—roughly speaking, about a tithe—of the contents now appears for the first time; indeed, of the thirteen studies which form Mr. Benson's modest portrait-gallery no fewer than twelve have been already exhibited elsewhere. Yet so unerring is the eye of the artist, and so firm and loving his touch—above all, so boldly is he resolved to penetrate, by a strenuous effort of sympathy and imagination, through the bewildering veil of outward act and circumstance to the true spiritual features behind, that it would be impossible to rob this collection of even its slenderest sketch without thereby inflicting a substantial injury upon it, and a proportionately heavy loss upon all to whom it promises to afford instruction and delight.

Mr. Benson's conception of the proper function and rightful aims of criticism is at once lofty and broad. He is, manifestly, no mere arbiter of the elegancies of style, no diligent registrar of stray verbal graces, no curious connoisseur of the piquant sallet and the sugared conceit. He does not confine himself to the discussion of decorative novelties of phrase, of striking and unwonted turns, or of the established technical rules which regulate respectively the arts of prose and verse. The interpretation of Life rather than Literature, or, let us say, the interpretation of Life through Literature—such evidently seems to him the paramount concern, the true end, of criticism. Thus his aim, throughout the greater number of these studies, is to fix, so far as may be, the authentic outlines of a human soul on the evidence of its written remains. With this object in view, the remains are to be weighed, sifted, interrogated, appraised—a task which, even though it be but a means to an ulterior end, yet demands, from him who would achieve it, the service of many natural gifts and high accomplishments. Then, this preliminary analytical process having been concluded, from its resultant elements there still remains to be built up the true spiritual effigies of the writer, in its just proportions and entirety.

These essays were, it appears, chosen casually, and their present arrangement is fortuitous. Nevertheless, throughout them all there runs a certain minor feature—a slender trace of family likeness—which seems to give unity and coherence to the volume. What that feature is Mr. Benson, in his Preface explains as follows:

"I have always chosen, for biographical and critical study, figures whose personality or writings have seemed to me to possess some subtle, evasive charm, or delicate originality of purpose or view. . . . I do not say that the note of failure is a characteristic of all the figures in my narrow gallery of portraits. But I will say that they were most of them persons about whom hung an undefined promise of greater strength than ever issued in performance. The causes of their comparative failure are difficult to disentangle. With one, perhaps, it was the want of a sympathetic entourage; with another, a dreamy or mystical habit of thought; with this one, the immersion in uncongenial pursuits; with that a certain failure in physical vitality; with another, the work accomplished in dignified serenity has fallen too swiftly into neglect, and we must endeavour to divine the cause; and yet in no case can we trace any inherent weakness, any moral obliquity, any degrading or enervating concession."

From all this it will be readily gathered that brilliance is not the leading mark of Mr. Benson's volume. His work does not dazzle: nay, it can hardly be said even to exhilarate us. And yet—to take the readiest instance—what a strong, quiet fascination there is for us in his group of seventeenth-century worthies—the "ever-memorable" John Hales, the Microcosmographer, John Earle, and Henry More, the Platonist! As we pause to muse upon the careful, reverent work of the artist, there seems to steal gently down upon us from the sober-tinted canvas

"A sweet, attractive kind of grace;
A full assurance given by looks;
Continual comfort in a face,
The lineaments of Gospel books."

And we feel that it was good for us to turn for once aside from the dust and glare, the noise and turmoil, of life's thronged highway, to tarry awhile in the calm presence of these steadfast souls, and under the benediction of their tranquil gaze.

Of a memorable incident in the life of the first-named of the group, by the way—his visit (as chaplain of the English Ambassador in Holland) to the Synod of Dort in 1618—Mr. Benson writes as follows:

"Hales went to Dort a Calvinist—that, in those days, is equivalent to saying that he had never given his theological position much attention. . . . He came home what was called a Latitudinarian, having, as he quaintly says, at the 'well pressing' of St. John iii. 18, by Episcopius (a divine, present at the Synod) 'bid John Calvin good-night.' A Latitudinarian translated into modern English would be a very Broad Churchman indeed."

Now—and we ask the question with sincere diffidence—can it be that Mr. Benson here slightly overstates, without intending or perceiving it, the extent of the change which his visit to Dort occasioned in the theological standpoint of John Hales? Or is it perchance merely Mr. Benson's manner of describing that change that tends to produce an exaggerated impression in the mind of the reader? Anyway, one would like, were it permissible, to believe that the distance traversed by Hales was not quite so great, the revolution in his religious views not quite so far-reaching, as the passage quoted above apparently suggests; for, if Hales really returned from Dort what would nowadays be described as "a very Broad Churchman indeed," is it not hard to understand how, consistently with honour (to say nothing of a tender conscience), he could have assented to, and even assisted at, his own elimination and effacement by the acceptance of Laud's chaplaincy and a canonry at Windsor? In this connexion it is perhaps well to remember that, according to the testimony of John Hales himself (in a letter dated January 19, 1619), the famous discourse on St. John iii. 16 was delivered, not by Episcopius, who was a notorious Arminian, but by Matthias Martinus of Bremen, who was what theologians term a "halfway man": a circumstance which certainly lends some plausibility to the conjecture of Dr. A. Gordon* that the change experienced by Hales in 1618 was after all nothing more momentous than a happy deliverance from sectarian prejudice of every kind whatsoever!

As an instance of the "close observation, and even grotesque transcription, of Nature" occasionally to be found in the poetry of Marvell, Mr. Benson quotes these lines from "Damon the Mower," commenting on them as follows:

"The grasshopper its pipe gives o'er,
And ham-strunged frogs can dance no more;
But in the brook the green frog wades
And grasshoppers seek out the shades."

"The second line of this we take to refer to the condition to which frogs are sometimes reduced in a season of extreme drought, when the pools are dry. Marvell must have seen a frog with his thighs drawn and contracted from lack of moisture making his way slowly through the grass in search of a refreshing swamp; this is certainly minute observation, as the phenomenon is a rare one."

Even the surest-footed critic, being but mortal, must needs stumble at times; but here Mr. Benson, apparently following "the industrious Dr. Grosart," contrives to miss the plain meaning of his author with an elaborate carefulness which provokes a smile. Damon sings while he mows, and in his plaint describes the ruin which follows in the wake of the scythe, prettily comparing it to the devastation wrought within his own breast by the beauty of the "fair, cruel maid." Behind, the close-shaven sod lies bare to the scorching eye of day, even as his heart to her flashing glances. The tall meadow, late home and haunt of countless happy creatures, has fallen, and its place is marked by prostrate ranks of grass, "withered, like his hopes." The poor denizens of the meadow have fled before the mower's "depopulating" arm, and now, instead of their merry chorus, there reigns a doleful silence in the air. Not a leaf remains to shelter a stray cricket; nor any trace of the vanished tenants of the field, save here and there a luckless frog, whose limbs have been maimed and crippled by the cruel scythe. (If Mr. Benson, in the days of childhood, has ever stood to watch the mowers at work, he must surely remember many a piteous tragedy of this nature.) The root of Mr. Benson's mistake lies in his supposing that what is here described by Damon is simply the general effects of excessive heat: whereas what is in truth described is its specific effects upon the clean shaven and depopulated lawn.

Perhaps the most valuable portion of the contents of this book is that which now also appears for the first time, the essay or William Blake. A candid study of Blake was badly wanted—one which should be at once genial and discriminative, sympathetic, and yet sane: and this want Mr. Benson here, to a large extent, supplies. Indeed, were it only for the sake of this essay alone, the book is not one to be overlooked. Our limits forbid quotation or detailed criticism. We must therefore be content heartily to commend this, and Mr. Benson's work generally, to every serious student of English literature. His book is not designed merely to amuse an idle hour: it cannot be lightly taken up, laid down, and then resumed at will. It demands, indeed, from the reader both time and reflection; but those who are prepared to hazard both will rise from its perusal convinced that their investment has been a sound and profitable one.

T. HUTCHINSON.

Miracle-Plays. By Katharine Tynan Hinkson. (John Lane.)

It is delightful to meet Mrs. Tynan Hinkson in her true character as poet. When all is said that the most severe of critics can find in him to say of her new book of poetry, when its few anachronisms and its few lapses in style have been duly pointed out, all that will still remain to be done is, in mere justice, to eulogise in unstinted terms what is one of the loveliest works in contemporary poetry. It was a happy idea on the part of Mrs. Tynan Hinkson to follow in the path trod a thousand years ago by Hroswitha of Gandersheim; and it is a significant fact that the Irish poetess of to-day wears a more rapt face than the German poetess of all those years ago. It is impossible here to enumerate the qualities that go to make up Mrs. Tynan Hinkson's "Six Miracle Plays," a work more remarkable from the spiritual standpoint than any to be met with outside the famous Towneley Mysteries, Coventry Mysteries, Chester Plays, and York Plays.

While Mrs. Tynan Hinkson's new book naturally challenges comparison with these as regards the subject, no one who has knowledge of her delicacy in writing will need to be told that the poetry which she puts about her work makes it widely different from any miracle-plays of prior existence. Her poem to her book will show the spirit in which she wrote it:

"Before I tell of Thee, God's Son,
And all the sweet salvation
That Thy birth brought to labouring men,
Make me Thy little child again.
Bid me put off the years, and be Once more in meek humility
Thy little one and wondering-eyed.
Give me their faith who stood beadle
The mauler that Thy cradle was:
Vision of oxen and of ass
To see Thee curled on Mary's knee.
Yea, give me their humility,

Give me the quiet heart in breast,
And pure eye of the kindly beast
That gave its meal to be Thy bed,
And so was greatly honoured.
Ere I behold Thy mysteries Force Thou my soul upon her knees."

The first play deals with the Annunciation. Its scene is laid in the village street of Nazareth. In the distance goes the tall figure of the Angel. A woman stands gazing after him. To her enters a neighbour woman, and they speak.

"FIRST WOMAN:

"Who was it went as I came down,
With silver feet and golden gown,
And on his head a glory crown
Fine as the evening star?"

"Yonder's the very one. He goes Light-winged, and ruddier than the rose,
His lily's whiter than the snows
Or the swan's pinions are."

In those stanzas Mrs. Tynan Hinkson's whole art is revealed. It is a curious combination of poetry and painting, in which the work, when not beautiful by reason of its carefulness, takes a perilous beauty from its very carelessness. In this respect it is not alone among sacred poems, any more than, prior to it, the work of George Herbert was in this respect alone among sacred poems. As might be expected, the character which dominates Mrs. Tynan Hinkson's book is Mary. Here is the description of the Maid, given to a woman:

"Dove's eyes are hers and the dove's heart,
And lips whence words of kindness start,
Lonely and lovely, set apart
For some most favoured lot."

Some of her singing must be given:

"I would I might praise perfectly
Like lily of mine, and wind and bee,
And like my bird that sings to me,
The Lord of earth and heaven."

Alone, she is not friendless. She is sent friends.

"They come
In troops at twilight to my room,
They sit and help me at my loom
And set the purple threads
Whereof I fashion without seam
A purple garment in a dream.
Very lovely my strange guests gleam
With shining wings and heads."

All the thoughts of the Maid as she spins are of a child to be born to save men.

"If I might make His baby-clothes
Softer and silkier than a rose!
Happy is she who sits and sews
His robe of linen fine."

A poet who writes in this high and holy strain is not to be handled roughly even when she makes "clothes" rhyme with "rose"; but she is to be touched gently and told that this is a flaw in her lovely work.

The second play deals with the Visitation. The scene opens on the inner sanctuary of the Temple. Outside a great multitude prays; within, Zachary kneels and swings a censer. This is part of what he sings:

"Float clouds and wreath the feet of Him
Who sitteth on the ocherubim,
Whose hair hath made the noontide dim,
Whose face warm splendours veil."

When one has read that twice the odds are that one is no longer on earth. To Zachary enters Mary, who has come to make a stay with Elizabeth. Both women are mothers of sons, in expectation. The case, as Mary sings the . . . by which opens:

"Nine months have I desired you, sweet,
To kiss your prisoned hands and feet. . . ."

What follows is the epilogue to the Nativity:

"There lay the Baby-King,
Holy and undefiled;
The earth can show no sweeter thing
Than a little child.

A flower is fine and sweet,
And sweet is a bird,
But sweeter far from head to feet
Was the Baby Lord.

A lamb is very meek,
And pure is a dove;
The Lamb of God was small and weak,
All purity above.

Most blessed was she
Who had Him for her own;
Who rocked Him on her tender knee,
Whose bosom was His throne.

Right blessed she was
Who fed Him at her breast,
And while the nine sweet months did pass
Made for Him a nest."

The "Presentation in the Temple" is next given, and here there is what may verily be described as a miracle within a miracle. A woman approaches Mary and speaks these words:

"Lady, thy Baby is so fair.
Such waves of glory on His hair,
We, mothers of many babes, aver
Was never such a child."

In the fifth play, the subject of which is the flight into Egypt, is the exquisite incident of the robber's wife suckling her babe, holding jealously close to her the little one "white with the leprosy." The strange lullaby given to this woman—

"The saddest poor mother That ever earth had"— is surely unsurpassed for pathos in lullaby song.

The story of the coming and childhood of Jesus, as here set forth in plays, ends with the finding in the Temple. In regard to the theological bias of a book which is instinct with poetry from the first page to the last, it seems only necessary to say that it is the work of a Catholic mystic, whose genius entitles her to meet with as general and ungrudging admiration as was given to that Catholic mystic from whom even Luther would not withhold his praise.

ment on the illustrations by Patten Wilson.
They show a great wealth of fancy; and, while there will be found persons to say that they have seen such and such before, it may be conceded that the resemblance which these curious pictures bear to work with which all the world is familiar is not a likeness so startling that it becomes a sameness. I have only one question—a woman's —to put to the artist: Why does he represent the robber-wife's little baby as a large, lank person whom not even the lovingest mother could hide in her bosom?

ELSA D'ESTERRE-KEELING.

Under the Czar and Queen Victoria. By Jaakoff Prelooker. (Nisbet.)

THIS is the autobiography of a Russian reformer. Jaakoff Prelooker was born in 1860, in the town of Pinsk, in the province of White Russia, bordering on Poland.
His father was a merchant, but lived with his wife and children, according to the custom of Russian Jews of his time, in the house of the author's grandfather, Rabbi Abraham Prelooker. We can judge from the portrait of this patriarch, as well as from the narrative, that the Rabbi heartily despised the march of progress outside his synagogue. Not that the Rabbi was so intolerant as some who assume the name of Christian; for, as he told the Molocan peasants, the righteous of the Gentile nations would not go to hell, but would have a lower Paradise of their own apart from the true Israelites.

At the age of four Jaakoff Prelooker was sent to school to learn to read the Bible.
All his schools, whether private or official, seem to have been on the same mistaken principle—all work and no play. After "two years of continuous torture" he was considered ripe to begin the study of the Talmud, and by the age of twelve he knew almost the whole of the Old Testament in Hebrew by heart, as well as many volumes of the Talmud. He was then sent to the famous Rabbinical Academy in Slonim, in the government of Grodno. This academy (of which he was one of the youngest members, the oldest being about twenty-five) was "a kind of Jewish monastery for the torture of those of the young generation who aspire to become teachers and leaders of Israel." The lectures are free, but the students have to provide for themselves everything else as best they can.
The majority of them are so poor that they sleep on the floor of the class-rooms on sacks of straw. The charitable spirit of the small Jewish community of Slonim is perhaps unparalleled. The poorest washerwoman considers it her sacred duty to board one or two students systematically during one or two days a week, and no Jewish house in the town is without such guests.

This was in the days of Alexander II., when the Government did its best to attract the Jews to general education and to assimilate them with the Christian population.
Accordingly, special schools were opened for Jewish children, with privileges over the Christian schools; but the Jews were suspicious of such paternal care, and refused to send their children to these schools.
Thus, every autumn the Jewish children were compulsorily recruited into the Government schools, scenes of violence taking place between the parents and the educational "press-gang." Curiously enough, the Jewish boys themselves despised these Government students as learners of ungodly things, such as the Russian language and arithmetic. Not so Jaakoff Prelooker—he felt the thirst for knowledge, and secretly invited his friends to supper with him, thus learning to read Russian. In his own family he had been taught that everything not written in the Hebrew language was the work of the devil. The ferment set up in his mind by the discovery of Russian literature may be easily imagined.

To the delight of the Government official, but to the horror of his parents, he asked to be admitted into the Government school.
He was then ordered home, where Talmudical studies and repentance were insisted on. He, however, persisted in his studies, and, with a fortune of ten shillings, and no hope of any parental assistance, he started on his five days' journey to the Government college at Gitomir. His capital was reduced by the loss of two (paper) roubles carried by the wind into the Dnieper; but he reached Gitomir, and, after a most arduous struggle, succeeded in obtaining a royal pension. Until this was secured, he supported himself by giving lessons to poor pupils at an average charge of one penny per hour.

Life in a Royal Russian College is most graphically described; but we have only space here to quote one passage—that in which the author describes his introduction to the New Testament. The English reader must remember that a Russian Jew is taught to regard Christians as his "deadly or blood enemies" (damaonim); that orthodox persecution has produced among Eastern Jews an adamant conservatism, and that hatred and idolatry are supposed by them to be taught by the Gospel of Jesus Christ. What, then, was the surprise of Mr. Prelooker on reading the Gospel in its Russian translation,

"when in the fifth chapter of its very first book I read the divine words of its Author's Sermon on the holy Mount, breathing only affection, pity, and tenderness for all the suffering human race, and enjoining forgiveness and reconciliation as the treatment of enemies. The Sermon on the Mount was the daydawn of the first healing and happy heavenly light upon the darkness of my soul.
I read it over and over again, first to be convinced that my eyes were not deceiving me, secondly that I might see more and more clearly into the world of new ideas revealed to me by these few chapters."

It must not be imagined that because
Mr. Prelooker "loved" the Gospel that he renounced his ancestral faith. Most assuredly not—Mr. Prelooker thinks a man may be a good Jew and yet be a believer in the ethical teaching of the meek and holy Jesus. Towards the end of 1881 about fifty Jewish families gathered round him in Odessa and took the name of New Israel.
Their object was a reformed synagogue, a mitigation of the cleavage between Jew and Christian, and a recognition of the common brotherhood of religion. For ten years Mr. Prelooker carried on the unequal struggle against the jealousy of his own people and of the Government.
His position as a master in the Government school becoming at length intolerable, he decided on leaving Russia for ever. This was in June, 1891.

Mr. Prelooker writes of his own useful work in connexion with the New Israel movement with creditable modesty. He claims "neither any important practical achievements, nor even the consolation of having been seriously persecuted for his good intentions." Mr. Prelooker has never seen the interior of a Russian prison, save on the occasion of his visits to incarcerated friends. But he shall speak for himself, and with this quotation we must close our brief notice of a book which should be purchased as a work of reference on things Russian, as well as for its intrinsic charm as an autobiography:

"Humble schoolmaster as I was, never inciting anyone to revolutionary actions against the Government, even opposing terrorist enterprises as useless and harmful to the cause itself, preaching only a religious reformation to my own people, and a brotherly union with Christian people, disseminating ideas of reconciliation between creed and creed, class and class, man and man, and—should I add?—devoting to this peaceable activity all my leisure time, as well as all my pecuniary resources, yet they made my place too hot for me, baffled my every step, destroyed the results of my most cherished labours, compelled me to look silently and helplessly on the agony of my brother, striving to kill me morally and bodily when I was full of life and eager to work in the interest of my despised, degraded, abused, and downtrodden fellow man."

Lady Bonnie's Experiment. By Tighe Hopkins. (Cassells.)

ONE'S instinctive regret at not finding oneself once more in a living India under Mrs. Steel's guidance gives way immediately to pleasure and a certain measure of thankfulness. For in these groovy days it is true refreshment to find a master in one path also an adept in another. And in Red Rowans we breathe the very atmosphere, meteorological as well as human, of the Scotch Highlands. Mrs. Steel is to be congratulated on an undoubted success, which is all the more remarkable because Scotland is the chosen ground of a host of writers who are native to the place and to the manner born. Broadly speaking, the story is that of a man who loved many, and who was loved much—by one woman. Paul Macleod is extremely interesting as a psychological study, well thought out and unhesitatingly presented. He is very true to life in that partly he makes his own fate and partly his fate makes him. He is surrounded by the charming, though not very unusual, people Mrs. Steel knows so well how to draw. Among these stand out more particularly his sister, her husband, Lord George, and their children, Adam and Eve, the well-brought-up and decorous, and Blasius, the wicked and fascinating child, whose vagaries somebody accounts for on the theory of the influence of names on character. But the sentimental interest which a hero is expected to arouse hangs rather about Dr. Tom Kennedy, the friend of Marjorie, who loves not him but Paul Macleod. And Kennedy at last consoles himself with Marjorie's written words: "Friendship is a bigger thing than love."

Of all methods the most extraordinary, and among many methods by no means the least successful, is the polyglot method adopted by Miss Violet Hunt in A Hard Woman. First we have a kind of preface, in which a certain Mr. St. Jerome announces his intention of presenting his quondam friend, Lydia Munday, lineament by lineament to the world. Next comes a narrative of a scene at which Mr. St. Jerome was not present. Anon we have a purely dramatic episode, the names of the characters merely standing at the beginning of their speeches. In fact, whatever the treatment which a particular episode seems to demand, that treatment Miss Hunt vouchsafes to it. The most important thing about innovations is the result; and in Miss Hunt's case the result is a series of brilliant, terse, and vivid pictures. Her characterisation is brief, telling, and witty. Nevertheless, it must be said that the chief difference between Dodo and Lydia Munday is the difference between Mr. Benson and Miss Violet Hunt. In the books of both writers, moreover, there is the same mere suggestion, and almost absence, of physical environment of the personages. When Lydia and Cossie Davenant are getting drowned on the Scour at Swanbergh, this baldness of description is very marked. But perhaps one of the most striking things about the book is the daring of deliberately picturing the downfall and failure of a brilliant and successful woman. Still, it is on her downward path that Lydia Munday for the very first time calls out a scrap of sympathy or even liking; and in the final scene, when she and her husband are left at last alone with the truth—and very little else—one's pity comes very near to liking after all.

Welcome, thrice welcome, to the Gladys-ridden, Gwendolen-bestridden critic will be the Susans, Janes, and Annas of the next generation of novels. Alas, that Miss Bramston's Too Fair a Dawn should have dawned too early for them. Her Crystal and Dynevor Dagenham have much to overcome ere they can win to the right-minded reader's heart. Crystal never does win there, but in time she obtains recognition as a well-drawn portrait of a weak, vain, worshipped woman. The central idea of the story is a good one, though at the end of the book one's optimism about this life is inconsiderately shaken. Its author evidently looks on this life as a short and comparatively unimportant episode in the soul's career. Dynevor Dagenham, sent down from Oxford for winning too much money at billiards, and believing himself to be cursed with the ancestral sin of gambling, thinks he has found in Crystal the ideally pure and beautiful woman. He hardly dares lift his eyes to her, but after long years he marries her. Then begin Dynevor's rise and Crystal's fall. He attains to great and painful heights of self-sacrifice and unacknowledged nobility; she sinks to dishonour by an easy descent of vanity, selfishness, and temptation. It is a good story, and only wants a little more style to be a striking one. The subsidiary characters are very well put in.

The title of Mr. Percy White's story is as apt as it is unpleasant. The book is a study in corruption and nothing else, though it lacks the touch of the master which alone could be its excuse and justification. Paul Carew's corruption is, perhaps, supposed to be already complete when the story opens; and it is the slow disintegration of Beatrice Mannering's moral nature that we are invited to watch. Carew, a young and extravagant fellow, is a needy political light, who has just been acknowledged by the leaders of his party as well worth notice. Eight years ago began his—well, Mr. Percy White occasionally calls it friendship—with Beatrice Mannering, then unmarried, and living with her father down west, where a privet hedge and a wicket gate (this is much insisted on) were all that divided her from Paul in his father's garden. She is a glorious creature in body and mind: Paul calls her Oiroe; and her passion for him is described as elemental. They do occasionally try to break off the "friendship," not on very high grounds, however; but in the end, on the plea that they are ready whenever called upon "to pay the price," she continues to deceive her husband, and Carew takes to himself an innocent adoring little wife "to balance Mannering." A revengeful valet's revelations at last cause them "to pay the price," and they fly abroad. One is prepared for everything that follows, except Beatrice's final act. There is not in the representation of this Beatrice a single thing to captivate the reader, in spite of bronze hair and white skin. Now and then she says a clever thing, but she leaves one totally unmoved. The best thing in the book is the political life, which is well and convincingly drawn.

Morton Verlost is a strong book, strong in conception, in treatment, and in its ending—three separate opportunities of weakness, one or other of which is usually embraced by story-writers. This story, moreover, respects itself, for it is divided into books, a thing assuredly not dared by any story that knew itself to be flighty or trivial. The many separate threads are well handled; and the reality of the people and events is even striking, especially in the case of the negroes in the West Indies, their fetish-worship, and their belief in the power of the Ring. The magic of this ring is at the bottom of everything. By its power is accumulated the fortune which causes Morton Verlost to marry Nora Smith. For its sake the negroes obey him though they hate him, and it both saves his life and gives him over to be foully murdered. That is to say, it all seems so on the face of things. Yet the story is so true that, given the characters, things must have fallen out as they did, ring or no ring.

Miss Florence Warden has chosen by no means the most descriptive title for her story. Harry Brancepeth's chief characteristic is not that she is spoilt in the ordinary sense of the word, nor is she at all the chief personage in the book. That post is occupied, so to say, by the whole Brancepeth family, who tear over the country without respect for rights or persons. The presentation of Harry and her brothers is capital. They dash through the pages and ride roughshod over the reader's delicate sensibilities. But Harry and Athelstan are made for better things, a fact they respectively find out: she when she meets the new tenant of the vicar, he under the timid gaze of the vicar's best daughter. This tenant is a pleasant enough sort of man, and one is quite sorry to hear, on two occasions, of his being put on his "metal." The story is one of the eventful kind, and spins along in Miss Warden's bright, rapid, and capable manner.

Long, but entertaining, would be one's first hasty verdict on The Light of Scarthey. Going more into detail, one would perforce have to complain of the author's inveterate habit of first telling of an event, and then deliberately going back and describing all the various complications that led up to it. Nothing is more annoying to the average reader than being constantly taken back on his tracks like this. And Egerton Castle has such an excellent tale to tell, and such undeniable power of telling it, that it is a thousand pities not to let it run its proper course. The noble Sir Adrian's devotion, his brother Rupert's treachery, Captain Jack Smith's bravery and beauty, Molly's brilliance, Miss O'Donoghue's grim humour, and many adventures by sea and land—all these are valuable ingredients in the story.

Miss Adeline Sergeant has just returned from her excursion into the region of the North Pole, and one is glad to meet her again on the more familiar ground of English home life. No one better than she can picture the little ins and outs of family jars and family loves and sorrows. Her No Ambition is the story of a girl who won a scholarship at Girton, and was burning to take it up and begin her career. Then she saw that the money she would have to spend was wanted for other things, and gave up the scholarship, delicately avoiding giving her real reason. She was therefore looked on as a spiritless creature by the members of her family, and suffered many things in various ways. But she has her reward at the hands of Miss Sergeant, who so well understands how to lead a heroine or a hero through tribulation to peace and joy.

The subject, style, and treatment of Lady Bonnie's Experiment are just suited to the length of the story. The style, in particular, is light and brisk, and gracefully touches the surface of things, as is meet in so slight a book. Some of the conversations are admirably done, and the whole book has a distinct air and atmosphere of its own.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

TWO BOOKS ON WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

SIR WALTER BESANT'S Westminster (Chatto & Windus) does not profess to be a formal history, but a series of sketches of the life and condition of the abbey and the city of Westminster at various periods. Where the author attempts historical reasoning, he clearly shows that he is going out of his proper line, and his work is of little value. Fortunately, this is confined to the first chapter, which attempts to prove "that the Isle of Bramble was a busy place of trade long before London existed at all." Of course, the author proves nothing of the kind. We know from Tacitus that Londinium was already a place of great commercial importance in A.D. 61, little more than a century after Julius Caesar's first landing. How long it had existed before this we do not know; but Sir Walter Besant does not even attempt to produce any evidence that the site of Westminster Abbey was inhabited earlier than the date just mentioned. The only semblance of argument to this effect that we can discover in the chapter is that at Westminster there was once a ford of the Thames—the lowest ford on the river, and the only ford for many miles. From this it may, perhaps, be inferred that the spot is likely to have been of some importance "before London Bridge was built." But we cannot regard even this conclusion as certain. There is no evidence that any great road from Dover to the north-west existed when the Thames was a boundary between pre-Roman kingdoms; there may have been a defensive post at the northern end of the ford, but the nature of the site cannot have been suited for an inhabited place of any consequence. That the Watling-street, or a branch of it, crossed the ford at Westminster seems to be fairly made out (though the proof is not to be found in this volume); that the island on which the Abbey stands was inhabited during the Roman period is certain; but these propositions are quite different from that which Sir Walter Besant claims to have proved. When we add that the author cites the story of King Lucius and Pope Eleutherius as resting on the evidence of tradition, and refers to the spurious charter of Offa as if it were genuine, it will easily be seen that he is not a safe guide in the history of these early periods. It may be remarked in passing that the name Thorney (for which the spurious charter seems to be the primary authority) does not mean "The Isle of Bramble." To confound "bramble" and "thorn" is a mistake that one is tempted to call cockneyish. However, though Sir Walter Besant has not the qualifications of a critical historian, he possesses abundance of historical imagination, and his vivid pictures of the life of the past will be read with profit as well as delight even by students of history. Apart from the first chapter, the volume is altogether admirable. Nothing could be much better, in their own kind, than the unverifiable quotations from unknown chroniclers and diarists which enliven some of the chapters. One of them tells how in the year 1520 a stranger, wandering through the Sanctuary of Westminster, met with a hale old man in clerical dress, who soon revealed himself as the author of "The Garland of Lawrell." We are quite sure that he was no impostor; his recorded conversation leaves no doubt that it was indeed Skelton himself. The 130 illustrations, by Mr. William Patten and other artists, are almost without exception excellent, and add greatly to the interest of this very attractive book.

Annals of Westminster Abbey. By E. T. Bradley (Mrs. A. Murray Smith). With a Preface by the Dean of Westminster, and a Chapter on the Abbey Buildings by J. T. Micklethwaite. Illustrated by W. Hatherell, H. M. Paget, and F. S. Walker. (Cassells.) We remember observing with some surprise that the publishers' original advertisement of this sumptuous volume, while making great claims for the excellence of the illustrations and the typography, said nothing whatever in regard to the merits of the text. Whether it was thought that the character of the "letter-press" (to use this disparaging term) was a matter of secondary consequence, or that its quality was sufficiently warranted by the name of the author, we do not know. It is gratifying to find that Mrs. Murray Smith's history of the Abbey is not only attractively written, but also a sound and careful piece of work. In dealing with the early periods the writer has, on the whole, distinguished between facts and legends or fictions with much more judgment than is usually found in works of the same class. The story of Ingulf and Queen Edith, however, is given without any warning, and is accompanied by an illustration representing the incident; but this is the only slip of the kind that we have noticed. The history is brought down to the Jubilee celebration of 1887, which makes rather a telling ending. Mr. Micklethwaite's chapter on the Abbey buildings is useful, and is accompanied by a large folding plan of the church and the buildings immediately adjoining, and smaller plans showing the arrangement of the monastic buildings at two different periods. We observe two or three trifling but disfiguring misprints. The illustrations, of which there are more than 150, are of a high degree of artistic merit, though in some cases we doubt whether the mode of reproduction adopted altogether does them justice.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. GLADSTONE'S edition of Bishop Butler's Works, in two volumes, was practically completed before his visit to Biarritz, and will be published in a few days by the Clarendon Press. The editor has broken up Butler's writings into sections, which he considers indispensable: "Who is there," he asks, among the ancient philosophers, unless perhaps Aristotle, the tissue of whose thought is closer than that of Butler?" He has also supplied every section with a heading, intended to assist the eye and the mind of the reader by an indication of its contents; and has prepared a full index to each volume, "designed to aid the memory of the student rather than to present an exhaustive analysis." He has added a limited number of notes, explanatory and illustrative; and ends his brief statement of the causes which have led him to undertake so long and laborious a work with the brief apology: "Better thus, than not at all."

MR. JOHN LANE has in preparation, for immediate issue in pamphlet form, Mr. William Watson's sequence of sonnets, entitled "The Purple East," which have been appearing from day to day recently in the Westminster Gazette. The sonnets have been subjected to a vigorous revision; and a frontispiece, by Mr. G. F. Watts, will appear in the pamphlet, which is to be sold at a nominal price.

IN a few days Messrs. W. & R. Chambers of Edinburgh, will publish the first volume of the new edition of Dr. Robert Chambers's Life and Works of Robert Burns, revised by Mr. William Wallace. While the plan of the original work has been adhered to, we understand the first volume will present many new features. Several portions of the biographical narrative, more particularly those dealing with Burns's life in Irvine and his intention to leave for Jamaica, have been recast and rewritten. The question of his ancestry has been treated exhaustively, and his religious views have been more fully elucidated than hitherto. A good deal of fresh information upon the mysterious episode of Highland Mary will be incorporated in the work. The first volume will contain many letters and poems which did not appear in the corresponding volume of the previous edition. Another special feature will be the abundant notes attached to both poems and letters. The work is being illustrated by Messrs. C. Martin Hardie, George Pirie, W. D. Mackay, and R. B. Nisbet.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish in the course of the present month Ulster as it is; or, Twenty-eight Years' Experience as an Irish Editor. It is written by Mr. Thomas Wright, author of several historical works; and will form two volumes.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish, before the end of this month, a book by Mr. Thomas Lough, M.P., on the financial relations between Ireland and Great Britain. Without any appeal to politics, it seeks to find the causes of Irish poverty. It will be illustrated with several diagrams, showing the economic conditions of the country.

WE quote the following from the Bookman: "The remaining MSS. of Charlotte Brontë in the possession of her husband and others have now been purchased for publication. They are far more numerous and important than had been imagined, and will make a substantial addition to the body of her work, alike in prose and poetry. A very large number of hitherto unknown letters having also been recovered, a biographical volume will be published entirely made up of fresh matter, repeating nothing that has already appeared in Mrs. Gaskell's biography."

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS will publish shortly, in volume form, the series of "Tales of our Coast" which have been appearing lately in the Idler. The authors represented are Messrs. S. R. Crockett, Gilbert Parker, Harold Frederic, Q., and Mr. W. Clark Russell; and there will be twelve illustrations by Mr. Frank Brangwyn.

MESSRS. ALDEN & Co., of the Bocard Press, Oxford, announce Chronicles of the Royal Borough of Woodstock, compiled from the borough records and other original documents, by Mr. Adolphus Ballard, the town clerk, with a chapter on Blenheim Palace. There will be numerous illustrations, including the corporation chest of the fourteenth century, the corporation seal (1461), and the borough mace (1600).

MR. ELLIOT STOCK will publish immediately a volume entitled Industrial Day Dreams: Studies in Ethics and Economics, by Mr. Samuel E. Keeble.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. announce the following novels, each in one volume: Roger Vanbrugh's Wife, by Miss Adeline Sergeant; The Trespass of Two, by Mr. Frederic Breton, of which the scene (as in the case of a former novel by the same author) is laid in the Western Highlands; and In a Silent World, the heroine of which is a deaf and dumb girl.

MR. FRANK MURRAY, of Derby, announces a new volume of poems by Mr. John Gambril Nicholson, to be entitled A Chaplet of Southernwood. The same publisher invites subscriptions to Kirkland's Glossary of Derbyshire Words and Phrases, to be issued monthly as a supplement to Notts. and Derbyshire Notes and Queries.

MISS MATHILDE BLIND's recent volume of verse, Birds of Passage, has already passed into a second edition.

ON Tuesday next, Prof. Charles Stewart, Fullerton professor of physiology, will begin a course of eleven lectures at the Royal Institution, on "The External Covering of Plants and Animals; its Structure and Functions"; on Thursday next, Mr. Philip H. Wicksteed will deliver the first of a course of four lectures on "Dante"; and on Saturday, Dr. A. Donaldson Smith will deliver a lecture entitled "To the North of Lake Rudolf and among the Gallas."

AT a meeting of the Society of Arts, to be held on Wednesday next, with Lord Reay in the chair, Prof. Silvanus P. Thompson will read a paper on "The Making of a Great University for London."

MESSRS. SOTHERBY will be selling next week several libraries of minor importance. Among them is the collection of the late Vicar of Capel, near Dorking (the Rev. T. R. O'Flaherty), who seems to have been specially interested in the history and divinity of the seventeenth century. He possessed a number of the works of Donne, including a MS. of his poems dated thirteen years prior to the first collected edition, and a copy of his sermons that had been presented by Izaak Walton to his aunt. Among the other collections we notice the second and fourth folios of Shakespeare, Shakespeare's Poems (1640), the first edition of Paradise Lost with the first title-page, the Description de l'Egypte, and a MS. Glagolitic liturgy of the fifteenth century.

ACCORDING to the Publishers' Circular, the total number of new books and new editions issued during last year was 6516, thus showing that the increase which began in 1892 still continues. For the first time, novels and juvenile works are brought together under one heading, the number of these being 1891, or nearly 29 per cent. of the total. There are, of course, the usual variations in the other classes; medicine having largely increased, and law having still more largely decreased. Poetry shows the respectable figure of 231, as compared with only 60 nine years ago. On the other hand, the fall in theology would seem to be permanent: 570, compared with 967 fifteen years ago.

MESSRS. GEORGE PHILIP & SON have sent us a special map of British Guiana, to illustrate the boundary dispute with Venezuela—a purpose which it serves admirably. It is on a large scale, with the rivers, mountains, and gold-fields plainly marked. It also shows by colours the several frontiers that have been claimed at different times, including the two Schomburgk lines. It is commonly said that the extreme limit of the Venezuelan claim extends to the Essequibo river. But it is here marked as stopping short, along the coast, at the Pomerun river and Cape Nassau, thus precisely agreeing with the old map in Stedman's Surinam (1796), to which attention was recently directed in the ACADEMY. Two further points are also worthy of mention. First, that that portion of the Essequibo watershed which the British Government has practically abandoned as being outside the more advanced Schomburgk line is dotted with Spanish names; and second, that in the south—or rather the south-east—the British claim distinctly crosses the mountains into the watershed of the Amazon, and is consequently disputed by Brazil.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

TO WILLIAM WATSON.

WHAT though Time passes, and the ages roll
For ever sea-like round about the pole
Of Time; the centuries with sandalled feet
Troop onwards; and thou hear'st not the beat
Of their all-silent steps! Why question now,
If thou remember'st the why or how
Of that great fight wherein thou play'st thy part
With kingly courage and undaunted heart?
Should'st thou perchance forget, yet we are "sure
Who lost or won at Agincourt."
O poet, who thus sings in mighty strain
The deeds of those who live through thee again,
Be sure of this, the monarch who lies low,
The "vainly great of Fontevraud,"
Could he but hearken as we hark to thee,
He would be half contented still to be,
Not Richard, he who bore the pain and loss,
Not he who grandly fail'd to plant the cross
Upon the Holy City's sacred height;
But he, the king who shed a glorious light
Around him; and thou, poet true, hast caught
Its dim and far off flicker, and hast taught
The listening throng that yet the light still glows.
Yes, we can hear the echo of the blows
That fell at Ascalon; and thus through thee
The grand sad drama once again we see.

Seven hundred years have passed; the crescent waves,
Symbol of Turkish power, above the graves
Of those who strove the Moslem rule to tame.
And we stand idly by, nor feel the shame
That those rude warriors felt. At least they died, Fighting with mad devotion, side by side,
In vain endeavour to uprear the Cross.
They won a deathless glory—shame and loss
Remain for us; they did their best to save
From impious hands their Lord and Master's grave.
The silver crescent, lifted to the sky,
The Crucified, the Christ, doth yet deny.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for January contains two striking little sermons. One, by the late Dr. Dale, bears the title "The Tower of Babel." So far as its Biblical basis goes, it hardly deserves the honour of print, and shows how little has yet been done in spreading correct knowledge on the contents of the Book of Genesis, and how few preachers know where to go for sound information on the subject. The other, by Dr. Denuy, whose American lectures on theology are a sign of the revival which is passing over orthodoxy, is called "Caesar and God," and leads up to a conclusion, which is rather political than theological, on the subject of "national churches." The Dean of Canterbury is on safe ground when he defends the methods and main results of the "higher criticism" against what he believes to be the view of Prof. Sayce. To be complete, it would be necessary to point out the kernel of truth which all thorough scholars would admit in some of the criticisms of Prof. Sayce, so far as they relate to the narrower type (now rapidly becoming extinct) of Old Testament specialists, and to urge the importance of making English Assyriology much more philologically exact and critical. Prof. Ramsay contributes a slight but interesting sketch of Basil of Caesarea, based upon the recent translation of that great man's letters. Dr. Redpath gives a retrospect of earlier concordances to the Greek Old Testament; and Prof. Cheyne examines and accepts an emendation of the text of a passage in a prophecy of Balaam, which D. H. Müller considers to refer to the almost forgotten kingdom of Shama'al in North-West Syria, now better known to us through the discoveries at Senjirli. Nor must we forget a specimen of expository preaching of a more important kind than that represented in the two little sermons already referred to—Dr. Bruce's paper on "Jesus as mirrored in the First Gospel."

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for January presents us with a plea for a wider study of theology, not excluding its more speculative branches, by J. G. Bockenhoogen. Dr. Klap continues his monograph on Agobard of Lyons. Dr. Hoodemaker's renewed attack on Old Testament criticism is considered by a competent critical scholar, Dr. J. J. Matthes. Gunkel's "Schöpfung und Chaos" and Bleeker's book on Jeremiah's prophecies against the nations are reviewed by Prof. Koster. Among the shorter notices is one on Montefiore's "Notes on the Religious Value of the Fourth Gospel," in the Jewish Quarterly Review, by Prof. H. Oort.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CASTELL DWYRAN STONE.

Jesus College, Oxford: Dec. 30, 1895.

Some time ago you published one or two letters concerning the bilingual stone now at Gwarmacwydd, in the parish of Llanfallteg, Carmarthenshire. There is good evidence that the stone comes from the churchyard of Castell Dwyran, in the same neighbourhood; so I prefer calling it the Castell Dwyran Stone. A pretty full account of the stone from Mr. E. Laws, of Tenby, and the present writer appeared in due time in the pages of the October number of the Archaeologia Cambrensis. The Latin reads:

MEMORIA
VOTEPORIGIS

and the Ogam gives simply Votecorigas—the Goidelic form of the genitive, which appears as Voteporigis in the Latin. In my remarks on these words I ventured to suggest that the g or ig represents the semi-vowel i: that is to say, I thought that Voteporigis and Votecorigas were to be sounded approximately Voteporijis and Votecorias. I explained briefly why I did not regard these names as compounds involving the word rix, "king"—I may say that I am not yet convinced they do.

I went further, and suggested that this was no other than the tombstone of Gildas's Vortiporius, king of the Demetae in his time. I admitted that the r in the first syllable of the latter name reappeared in Welsh forms; but I suggested that its presence was due to the influence of the false analogy of some such name as that of Vortigern, which is made up of Vor-tigern, not Vorti-gern.

As to my identifying the stone with Gildas's contemporary, I am free to confess that I am greatly shaken by the adverse opinion of more competent men. One of these, Prof. Mommsen, has written me a letter, which I have his permission to publish in the ACADEMY. It was dated November 26, and I give it at length, except that the last paragraph, being of no interest to anyone besides my own family, has been omitted. I feel sure that I need not apologise, except for having delayed so long before sending it to you:

"I have to thank you for your memoir upon the tombstone at Llanfallteg, about which you want my opinion.

"The identity of this Voteporigis (the genitive in rigis requires this form necessarily) with Gildas's Vortepori, in the vocative, seems to me extremely doubtful. The nominative of this latter name is uncertain: if it has not been altered, the Latin requires Vorteporius; but it may have been originally Vortiporius (as stupidus follows), which is only orthographically different from Vortiporia. But I see no cogent reason for slaying the r, preserved, too, in the Welsh tradition (Zimmer's Nennius, p. 88); it is not very wonderful to find in the same country and at the same time a Mr. Porter and a Mr. Potter. But the general reader certainly will rush to the identification, and so let him have his way.

"Regarding the protector, I can only refer you to my memoir about the protectores in the Ephemeris Epigraphica (vol. v., p. 121 n.), and to my preface to Gildas (Chronica Minora, vol. III., p. 8). In the first tract you will find that this military dignity—in the same way as now a small prince may be named a colonel in the German army—was conferred in the declining epoch of Rome on barbarian noblemen and princes. An inscription from Reken names one Harulfus protector domesticus Aluis Frankaldi regalis gentis Burgundionum. This may have been a brother in arms to your Welsh nobleman. The charge was not hereditary, no more than our colonelship.

"The chief importance of the monument consists in finding the sepulchral stone of a Roman officer with an inscription half Latin, half Celtic. Unhappily the date remains uncertain, but still it probably belongs to an epoch when the Romans had already left Britain. But that part of Britain which was not occupied by the Saxons continued Roman, though in partibus, for ages and ages. I can only repeat what I said in my preface: 'partes eas [those mentioned by Gildas], quas regibus obediunt, non impedit quominus auctoritas visis sint comprehendi imperio Romano.' This would receive a splendid confirmation if one of these reguli could be found to have put on his tombstone his title as a Roman officer sent to him by the Byzantine Emperor. In any case, Voteporigis goes far to prove that the relations continued long after Honorius.

"The Latin inscription, judging from the form of the characters, could belong to the fifth century. Is it possible to date the Ogam inscription with any probability?"

I am sorry to say that the Ogam does not enable one to fix the date. The rest of the letter requires no comment from me, as it speaks for itself most suggestively.

JOHN RHYS.

ECCLÉSIASTES AND ARISTOTLE.

London: Jan. 1, 1896.

Though the proofs of Greek influence on Ecclesiastes which I was able to adduce some twenty years ago in my commentary on the Book were, I venture to think, tolerably cogent, yet, in the new edition for which I am now making preparation, I am anxious to include such further evidence as may be accessible. I have lately met with indications so obvious that I scarcely know how it was that I previously omitted to take them into account. The Authorised Version translates the third verse of the second chapter thus:

"I sought in mine heart to give myself unto wine, yet acquainting mine heart with wisdom; and to lay hold on folly, till I might see what [was] that good for the sons of men, which they should do under the heaven all the days of their life."

I wish particularly to direct attention to the concluding words, "what [was] that good for the sons of men which they should do under the heaven all the days of their life." It is scarcely necessary to say that the chief subject in the Nicomachean Ethics is the supreme good for man, τὸ ἀρετῶν ἀγαθόν. Of this "good" it is said, in Book I., chap. vii., τὸ ἀρετῶν ἀγαθόν ψυχῆς ἐνέργεια γίνεσθαι κατ' ἀρετὴν, with the addition ἐν βίῃ τελείῃ; for, says Aristotle, as neither one swallow nor one day makes a spring, so neither one day nor a short time can entitle a man to be called blessed and happy. The reader perceives at once that "good for the sons of men" might stand for a translation of ἀρετῶν ἀγαθόν. Next, ἐνέργεια answers to "which they should do," the "good" in question being spoken of elsewhere as "a practical good," and, in fact, τὸ πάντων ἀρετῶν τῶν πρακτῶν ἀγαθόν (I. iv.). To "all the days of their life" obviously corresponds ἐν βίῃ τελείῃ. The Hebrew might be rendered more literally "throughout the number of the days of their life," but this is not of much consequence. With respect to ψυχῆς there should be taken into account what is said of the "heart" in the verse quoted and in the context, though the meaning is not precisely identical. In ver. 24, which is concerned essentially with the same matter, we have "soul" (נֶפֶשׁ). There remains κατ' ἀρετὴν, which is omitted. But accurately to render this expression in Hebrew would have been difficult or impracticable.

The close relation of the passage in Ecclesiastes with Aristotle scarcely admits of question. There is no need for asserting that the author of Ecclesiastes had before him a MS. of the First Book of the Ethics, or some other document of the Peripatetic school. Oral communication may have sufficed.

Some difficulty has been felt with regard to אֵין זֶה טוֹב, "what was that good," or better perhaps, "what is this good." The difficulty disappears when "this" is looked upon as referring back to the researches of previous philosophers concerning "the good." The rendering "where is this good," though apparently approved by Gesenius, seems less suitable to the kind of good sought for.

It is somewhat surprising that the relation of Aristotle to Ecclesiastes in the passage which I have quoted should not have been seen—if, indeed, it has not been seen—by any previous interpreter. Grotius did not detect it, though he regarded Ecclesiastes as a discussion περὶ τῆς εὐδαιμονίας, conducted, moreover, in a manner resembling that of Aristotle. But Grotius, though he rejected the Solomonic authorship, and assigned the book to an age later than that of Solomon, failed to perceive its true historical position.

There are at least two other places in Ecclesiastes where Aristotelian influence may be with probability discerned, a probability greatly increased by the evidence just adduced. The first of these places is Eccl. vii. 27, where Kohaleth speaks of endeavouring, by the consideration of facts or persons "one by one," to discover the "thought" or "plan" which they embodied. Here we may trace the Aristotelian inductive method ἀπὸ τῶν καθέκαστα εἰς τὸ καθόλου. The other passage is xii. 13, which gives the general conclusion of the Book. I translated the first part of this verse, "The conclusion of the discourse, the universal law, let us hear." "The universal law" represents the Hebrew כָּלל (literally "the all"), which is perhaps as close a rendering of τὸ καθόλου as the language would allow. In my note on the passage I said, "There is here, it seems to me, a pretty certain trace of the influence of the Greek philosophy, and especially of that Aristotelian inductive method which aims at proceeding from Particulars to a Universal, τὸ καθόλου." The argument was strengthened by a comparison of the common formula of the Mishnah וְזוֹ הִיא הַגְּמָרָה "this is the general law."

It appears impossible to assert definitely that Aristotelian doctrine was the form in which Greek philosophy first exerted an influence on Judaism, though this seems not unlikely. In relation, however, to this question and to the indications in Ecclesiastes, we should not wholly disregard what is said in Josephus (Contr. Ap. i. 22), of personal relations between a learned Jew and Aristotle himself, while the philosopher was in Asia Minor. As to the Jewish Peripatetic philosopher, Aristobulus, and his work on the allegorical interpretation of the Mosaic Law, it may be sufficient to say that he is probably to be placed some time after the date of Ecclesiastes.

THOMAS TYLER.

A LETTER OF WILLIAM PENN TO THE FIRST DUKE OF ORMONDE.

Oxford: Jan. 4, 1896.

I cannot find that this letter from Penn to the Duke of Ormonde, dated Philadelphia, January 9, 1682, has yet been printed. It has been transcribed from the Carte Papers in the Bodleian Library (vol. xl., ff. 212 sqq.); and illustrates Penn's courage and independence during the last reactionary years of the reign of Charles the Second.

C. E. DOBLE.

"[F. 212.] MY NOBLE AND OLD FRIEND,

"Permit me! at this great distance the best way that is left me to Congratulate thy quiet and happy Regiment in Ireland,<sup>1</sup> and to salute thee with that sincere affection and respect, which former obligations have raised in me and made indelible by time or distance.

"The singular intimacies it pleas'd thee to allow me (above the men of my Rank) in the Court of Ireland, are remembered with adequate reëntments for I love gratitude, tho' I vainly lament my inability to show it; but it is some comfort that great men are borne to do good and that they have their reward in the good they do, or it would undo small folks to be the object of their favour. [f. 212<sup>b</sup>] But if it be below great men to be kind for recompence and marchandize their Powr, it is equally below all sensible Mindes to neglect to yield their best acknowledgements, and therefore Great Friend, suffer mine to waite upon thee tho in homely sort, which I have Confidence to hope will be taken in good part, when measur'd and vallu'd by the Respect and integrity of the heart that sends them. This said, I wish thee length of Days, health and true felicity, begging, by the old freedom and freindship that I have had with thee that thy Moderation may be known to all men in all things, because God, our Judge, is at the door, who will have the final Inspection of all our actions at that great and general Assizes of the world where nothing can be dissembled or escaped that we have done. This is a lesson that affects all, but [most] of all Magistrates and of those Supream, who have not only their own, but the peoples sins to answer for, if by example and punishment they labour not [to] teach virtue and deter the People from impiety and the reason is plaine, for Justice [f. 213] and Sobriety are the end of Government and the reason of that extraordinary pow'r not to vex men for their beleifs and modest practise of that faith with respect to the other world, into which Province and Sovereignty temporal Pow'r reaches not, from its very nature and end honeste vivere alterum non laedere, et jus suum cuique tribuere, (Pardon my extent) are the Magistrates mark. To take care of the worship of god was a peculer commission to the Jewish Potentates, whose entire modell in every ceramoneous part thereof, came from god, and which stood in external Rites for the most part, but the Religion and Kingdom of Christ are not of this world more mentall inward and spirituall; neither at the Mountane nor at Jerusalem, the Rites of neither place, but sales our blessed Savour, in spirit and in truth, with as little shew and pomp as may be, this is the worship Christian, not calculated to our senses, but our soules. This comes from heaven, overcomes and prevales by conviction, no fire from heaven to make conforme, much less from the earth. Christ Jesus to whom all pow'r is given, is Sufficient for that part. [f. 213<sup>b</sup>] As to him only it is appointed of the iather, but lett vice be punisht, Corporall Ills have Corporall Sufferings and Corrections, that the Magistrate may be a terror to evil doers, not mistaken beleivers about t'other world, Much less peaceable livers and worshipers. Of all that falls under thy administration, in the love of god and the sincere affection of a friend, lett me prevale with thee to avoide troubling Conscientious and quiet living dissenters; they are best for the Country and not the worst for the church, Since if Religion be at heart in our Great churchmen, they will love the example of such vertue, and make it a Spurr to mend the pace of those that they conceive of sounder principles in their own communion, for my part I frankly declare, that I cannot think that god will damn any man for the errors of his Judgement, and god forbid that we should think that all or the most part of the world err willingly in understanding; and if both be allow'd, the Conclusion is Short, that there are but two Churches in the world, and they contain all the good and bad people in it; of which Christ and Satan are the [f. 214] heads. So that damnation and Salvation goe not by names but natures and qualifications, according to the unquestionable doctrine of St. Peter and St. Paul, that god is no respecter of Persons, but thos that in all nations feare him and work righteousness shall be accepted, that men must reap what they sow, and his servants people are whom they obey; thus Christ overthrow the Jews great pretentions to Abraham, Moses, the Prophets, Law, Temple and Rites; if you commit Sin you are the Servants of Sin. Slighting their conceits of heirship and Sonship by Succession and peculiar traditions, a snare too powerful upon a great part of the world. Lett then the tares grow with the wheat, errors in Judgement remain till remov'd by the pow'r of light and conviction, a Religion without it is inhumane, Since reason only makes humanity; should men Supercede that to be conformists that essentially makes them better then beasts, to witt understanding; to Conclude men by authority is Coercive, to conclude by Conviction is manly and Christian. Lett it not, Noble Friend, be uneasy to thee [f. 214<sup>b</sup>] that I am thus long and perticular, tis a troublesome time in those parts of the world and good and peaceable men may suffer by the follies of other Pretenders. We hear of a Presbyterian Plott<sup>2</sup>, and the severity that is exercised against our freinds in divers parts on that occasion, tho to the Astonishment of our prosecutors there be none of them found in the list. 'Tis what I ever told both the King and Duke, and that at parting; if god should suffer men to be so farr infatuated as to raise commotions in the Kingdom, he would never find any of that party among them, at least of note or Credit, the Lord Hyde was by, now Earl of Rochester<sup>3</sup>, their designe being no more but to enjoy their Conscience and follow their vocations peaceably, that the labour of the week may not be the price of their Sabbath, I mean worship, and that I beleived he would live to be convinced that we never carried that matter higher; lett others answer for themselves, this makes me press the more upon thee in favour of our friends, in [f. 215] Ireland, because upon their address to the King (in which they pleaded their innocency and declared their abhorrance of plots and prayed) to be releived in their sufferings, the King gave them thanks and Said he beleived them, and promised to take care to redress them.

"I plead against my interest, for the severitys of those parts encrease the plantation and improvement of these. But I am for the Just and mercifull thing, whoever gets or loses by itt, as ought all men of truth, honour and Conscience to be, which said, give me leave to say something of these parts.

"I thank god I am safely arrived in the province that the providence of god and Bounty of the King hath made myne<sup>4</sup>, and which the credit, prudence and industry of the people concerned with me must render Considerable. I was received by the ancient Inhabitants with much kindness and respect and the rest brought it with them; there may be about four [f. 215<sup>b</sup>] thousand soules in all, I speak, I think, within compass; we expect an increase from France, Holland and Germany, as well as our Native Country.

"The land is Generally good, well water'd and not so thick of wood as imagin'd; there are also many open places that have been old indian fields, the trees that grow here are the Mulberry, white and red, walnut, black, gray and Hickery, Poplar, Cedar, Cypress, cheanut, Ash, Sassafrax, Gum, pine, Spruce, oake, black, white, red, Spanish cheanut and Swamp, which has a leave like a willow, and is most lasting. The food the woods yield is your Elks, Deer, Racoons, Beaver, Rabbets, Turkeys, Pheasants, heath-birds, Pidgeons and Patredges, innumerable; we need no setting dogs to ketch, they run by droves into the house in cold weather. Our Rivers have also plenty of excellent fish and water fowl, as Sturgeon, Rock, Shad, Herring, Cadfish or flatt heads, Sheeps heads, Roach and Perch and trout in inland Streames; of fowle, the Swan, white, gray and black goose, and brands, [f. 216] the best duck and teal I ever ate, and the Snipe and the Ourlue with the Snow-bird are also excellent.

"The Aire is sweet and cleare which makes a serene and steady sky, as in the more southern parts of France. Our summers and winters are commonly once in three years in extremes; but the winters Seldom last above ten weeks and rarely begin till the latter end of December; the days are above two hours longer and the Sun much hotter here then with you, which makes some recompense for the sharpe nights of the winter season, as well as the woods that make cheap and great fires. We have of graine, wheat, Maize, Rye, Barly, oates, severall excellent sorts of beans and pease, pumkens, water and mus mallons, all englesh roots and Garden stuff, good fruit and excellent Sider, the Peach we have in divers kinds and very good and in great

<sup>2</sup> Penn landed at Newcastle on the Delaware on or about October 27, 1682 (Janney, p. 205). With the remainder of this letter should be compared the full report to the Free Society of Traders of Pennsylvania, printed by Janney, p. 238 sqq., and Clarkson, p. 137 sqq., dated August 16, 1683.

THE SIN-EATER IN WALES.

Highgarth, Gloucester: Jan. 6, 1896.

I will not venture to emulate Mr. Owen by asserting that he has committed blunders; but I would point out: (1) That I read no paper before the British Association—as my letter in the ACADEMY of November 9 shows, I simply spoke in the course of a discussion on cannibalism; (2) that I have not attempted to prove that the custom of Sin-eating is Celtic, but that there was a custom of the kind in Wales; and (3) that I have not attempted to prove, either in what I said at the British Association or in my letters to the Times and the ACADEMY, that the Welsh funeral custom of the Diodles "is a mutilated survival of a cannibalistic savage rite formerly practised by the Celts, the central feature of which was eating the corpse." My paper in Folklore, published more than three and a half years ago, indeed gave an outline of an argument to this effect, which I have since much amplified and strengthened in the book referred to in the last of my three previous letters to the ACADEMY. My letters to the Times and the ACADEMY were merely directed to answering the arguments of Mr. N. W. Thomas and Canon Silvan Evans, to the effect that Sin-eating had never been practised in Wales; and I submit that Mr. Owen has not seriously attempted to controvert my position.

* There is a life of the well-known Quaker, John Burneyat, in the Dictionary of National Biography, vii., p. 420 sq., where it is stated that in 1683 "the Irish authorities became troubled by the rapid increase of Quakerism, . . . and Burneyat, who was the most active disseminator of the creed, was arrested at a meeting and sent to prison, though no formal charge seems to have been brought against him. After two months he was unconditionally released by order of the Earl of Arran." Lord Arran, too, was an old friend of Penn (Dixon, p. 60).

I have forgotten what I admitted in a private letter to Mr. Owen three months ago; but the context of his letter in the ACADEMY of December 7 appears to show that it had reference to the absence of the word "Sin-eater" in Welsh. Now, as this was one of the very arguments of Canon Silvan Evans which I was endeavouring to meet, it is manifest that I did not commit the blunder Mr. Owen alleges of withholding that evidence.

He is to be congratulated on his capacity for talking round a subject. I shall not follow him in his interesting but discursive remarks, but shall content myself with observations on one or two points. He complains that I have absolutely ignored Christian rites. Quite so; I was not dealing with the origin, but merely with the fact. When, however, he has mastered in its fuller shape my argument, as to the origin and meaning of the ceremony of Sin-eating, and is prepared to produce in detail the evidence that the Welsh and other customs are part of any Christian ritual, I shall be happy to discuss the question with him at the proper time and place. Meanwhile, I should like to draw his attention to the fact that the customs described by Robert Jones, by Aubrey, and by Pennant, are not apparently connected with any ecclesiastical ritual or Christian doctrine. It is true that they are described in Welsh books written under the influence of the Methodist Revival as relics of Popery. But Robert Jones and his compeers were not scientific students of custom. They simply lumped together as Popish all old customs which they thought to savour of heathenism. Is Mr. Owen a belated follower of that school of thought? It may be conceded that some of the customs described in the Drych and elsewhere were relics of Roman Catholicism. Such is the practice mentioned by Robert Jones, which Mr. Owen censures me for omitting: namely, that of going to the grave on the first Sunday after the funeral, and saying the Paternoster. The reason why I broke off my quotation from the Drych was that the subject of the Diodles ended where I ended the quotation; and if Mr. Owen will look at the book again he will see that the custom of saying the Paternoster, which he quotes, was practised on a different day (the Sunday after the funeral), at a different place (the grave), and, in short, has nothing to do with the Diodles. So much for his charge of shearing off the ritual words.

The condition of Cwmaman, described in Mr. Owen's second letter, is just the condition in which I should expect to find such an institution as Sin-eating. I need not pursue his surmises as to how Mr. Moggridge obtained his information, nor any of his other controversial conjectures. I can tranquilly wait until he has something better to offer. The same remark applies to his various abstractions of argumentative astonishment. His one point of any importance is that Aubrey's friend, Ray, the naturalist, told him, in a letter which Mr. Owen quotes, that he was "a little too inclinable to credit strange relations." I am not aware whether we have Aubrey's letter to which this is a reply. From the context, however, we may gather that Ray was reproving Aubrey for attaching credit, not to reports of strange customs, but to prodigies of a different kind. Anybody who reads Aubrey's Miscellanies will see that the author was (like most of the men of his day) credulous of prodigies, apparitions, and portents; and it is to such as these that Ray, who was a student of nature, referred. But I have yet to learn that that is any reason for discrediting Aubrey when he relates things of a totally different character, wherein the miraculous is no element. In connexion with this, I am glad to find that Mr. Owen agrees with me in thinking that Aubrey actually witnessed the ceremony at Beaumaris; so that there, at all events, his credulity is beside the question.

Before I close, it is right that I should say, with regard to the funeral at Market Drayton (or, rather, at Wollerton, near that town), that, by the kindness of Miss Hope, I have been in communication with her informant, who was present on the occasion, and with the minister. There has been some misapprehension about the incident, and it now seems certain that the wine and biscuits were not handed across the coffin, but only given to the bearers and others in the presence of the coffin; and that this is the custom in that part of Shropshire. The minister's words also would appear only to have had reference to the general custom of eating and drinking at funerals. But even if the Market Drayton incident and the observation of the minister be erased entirely, the evidence is still abundant for the existence of the practice of Sin-eating and kindred observances in Wales and the Marches during the last two hundred and fifty years.

ARCHBISHOP USSHER IN OXFORD.

Jesus College, Oxford: Jan. 7, 1896.

In the review of the Life and Times of Archbishop Usher in the last number of the ACADEMY, I find the following observation: "He resided in Oxford (at Christ Church)." I cannot tell what grounds there may be for this statement, but it is certain that the Archbishop during his stay in Oxford was a member of Jesus College. In a Battel-book for 1640 the name "Jacobus Armachanus" appears at the head of the list of Gentlemen or Fellow Commoners. It does not appear in the books for 1641 or 1642, and the books for the years immediately following are missing; but in the book for 1652 I find in the same position as in 1640 "I. Usserius Armachanus."

In my account of the college (Clark's Colleges of Oxford, 1893) I see that I have said: "In 1644 James Ussher, Archbishop of Armagh, was resident in and a member of the college." I do not now remember on what authority I made this statement, and we have not the Battel-book for 1644; but it is probable that Ussher resided for several periods between 1640 and 1652. It would be interesting to know whether he was ever on the books of Christ Church, or whether the supposition is due to the similarity between the titles "Jesus" College, "Christ" Church.

It would also be interesting to know why the Irish Archbishop came to the Welsh college. A Jesus man—Owen Wood—was Dean of Armagh at the beginning of the seventeenth century; but as he died some years before Ussher became Archbishop, no influence can be traced here. The Archbishop probably owed to his college connexion his acquaintance with the Stradlings of St. Donat's Castle, with whom he resided in South Wales. Anthony a Wood mentions Ussher among others as an occupant of rooms in the building added to Exeter College by Dr. John Prideaux; but the antiquary is probably referring to an early visit of Ussher before he was made Archbishop. This building was then situated on the north side of Exeter College, close to the old Ashmolean Museum, and was once popularly known as "Prideaux's Connection." It was afterwards pulled down and re-erected in the Turl, where it has acquired the name of "the Swiss Cottage." Perhaps some of your historical contributors can add to our information about Archbishop Ussher's residence in Oxford.

A DOUBTFUL READING IN DANTE'S LETTER TO THE EMPEROR HENRY VII.

Dorsey Wood, Burnham, Bucks: Dec. 23, 1895.

At the close of his letter to the Emperor Henry VII, Dante apostrophizes him (according to the reading of the Oxford Dante, which is based upon that of Fraticelli) as "proles alta Isai" (i.e., exalted offspring of Jesse), and calls upon him to come and overthrow the modern Goliath (i.e., Philip the Fair), and deliver Israel (i.e., the oppressed Ghibellines) from the hands of the Philistines (i.e., the Neri). Reading alta, the epithet is somewhat pointless, though its defenders would doubtless justify it by a reference to the "alto Arrigo" of the Divina Commedia (Par. xvii. 82; xxx. 137). If, however, we read altera (which in MSS. might very easily be mistaken for alta), we get a much more appropriate expression and one more in Dante's manner. Elsewhere Dante speaks of Henry VII. as "alius Moyseus" (Epist. v. 1), of the rebellious Florentines as "alteri Babylonii" (Epist. vi. 2), and of Henry's son as "alter Ascanius" (Epist. vii. 5). It seems probable, therefore, that Dante wrote not "proles alta Isai" but "proles altera Isai" (i.e., a second David). Compare the similar expressions: "nuovo Jason" (Inf. xix. 85), "nuovi Farisei" (Inf. xxvii. 85), "nuovo Pilato" (Purg. xx. 91).

The only editor apparently who reads altera is Giuliani, who, as is usual with him, alters the received text without vouchsafing any comment or justification. In this instance, for a wonder, his emendation is not only an improvement, but is also unobjectionable on critical grounds.

A SENTENCE IN MILTON'S PROSE.

London: Jan. 2, 1896.

Mr. Hillier has been anticipated by Landor, who, in his magnificent defence of Milton against Lord Brougham, writes thus:

"Even in his arguments against prelacy, when he rises into poetry like the old prophets, and when his ardent words assume in their periphery the rounded form of verse, there is nothing stiff or constrained. I remember a glorious proof of this remark, which I believe I have quoted before, but no time is lost by reading it twice:

"... But when God commands to take the trumpet,
And blow a dolorous or thrilling blast,
It rests not with man's will what he shall say,
Or what he shall conceal."

I venture to prefer this arrangement to Mr. Hillier's; though Landor, quoting from memory, makes the mistakes of "thrilling" for "a jarring," and "it rests not with" for "it lies not in."

SCIENCE.

The Wild-Fowl and Sea-Fowl of Great Britain.

By A Son of the Marshes. Edited by J. A. Owen. (Chapman & Hall.)

UNLESS a man live in the Fen-country, or by the seaside at certain favoured spots, he is not likely to see much of that miscellaneous arrangement of birds known until the last thirty years as the Grallatores. He may put up a snipe or woodcock when shooting, flush a mallard or teal by some lonely brook, and be acquainted, thanks to fly-fishing, with the common and green sandpipers. It is quite possible to see the heron on the watch for prey as the train sweeps by—for in many localities this fine bird has lost all fear of the roar and rush of the locomotive. But he who can visit a muddy foreshore when he will, where the tide recedes into a misty horizon and leaves sheets of water connected, it may be, by treacherous "cuts," sees at many seasons in the year hundreds, not to say thousands, of wholly different kinds of birds as he lies by some old ribs of a wreck and surveys the coast through his glass. The air is alive, too, at dusk, with the screams, the chatter, the whistlings, the many different calls of the shore and sea birds. Far out of shot a couple of that wary bird the curlew may stalk; while beyond, grey plover, purple sandpipers, dunlins on their way to breed on the Scotch moors, stints about to cross to Norway for the same purpose, sanderlings, and even dotterels, now a rare bird, on the eve of seeking the highest mountains in the Lake District to lay their three handsome eggs, flit and wheel. Golden plover, too, may be discerned, a few lapwings, gulls of several sorts, an oystercatcher or two, and, also well out of shot, a pair of that grand bird, the greater black-backed gull. There is room for a lifetime's study to understand the habits, the coming and going of these birds and their congeners. But it involves much fatigue and exposure, much leisure, and not a little peril at times. The tide has an ugly trick of surrounding observers of birds by running up the "cuts" above mentioned before they realise it. Snowstorms and darkness may overtake the wanderer on the muddy flats. Interesting as shore birds are, it is not every one who can make their acquaintance at home among the sand and breakers. The next best thing to be done is to trust the author of these sketches.

The "Son of the Marshes" seems to have enjoyed unrivalled facilities of familiarly knowing shore-birds. Brought up, it may be gathered, among the Kent marshes, and from earliest boyhood consorting with fowlers and shore-shooters, he has amassed much knowledge of these birds, which is very different from the zoological learning with which many must be content.

"From childhood," he says, "the whole of my own life, sixty years of it, has been passed in the open air, by the waters and in the woods, by day and by night. I mean by this, all my leisure time—plenty of it—trying to find out for my own pleasure and instruction, never for money profit, the ways and means of God's creatures in their own homes and haunts."

Besides the bird-life of the foreshore, he introduces his reader to what is often the next zone of country before grass and wheat fields, the fen proper. It is not a cheerful district on which he places them,

"the most treacherous parts of the flats, covered with splashes and pools, with a film on the surface of them, coloured with all the hues of the rainbow. The firm part where we stand is rank to smell and bad to stand on for any time. Reed beds are all over the place; low reeds, for the water and ooze combined will not bring them to the full height here. In the heat of the day the place steams; when the sun gets low heavy curtains of grey, thick mist will float about just the right height to let you breathe all the noxious vapours of that ague and fever-stricken district."

Small wonder that "ager mixture" (gin or brandy) was popular among the shore-dwellers, and that there was a great consumption of laudanum. Just so in the Fen districts of Lincolnshire to the present day dwellers among the reed-beds call weekly on market-day at the chemists in the neighbouring towns, put down their pence and take up the regular weekly quantity of opium, which experience shows is needed as a prophylactic. It is in such boggy thickets that the bitter must, if anywhere, be sought, the coot and the water-rail. That rare and beautiful bird, the bearded titmouse, haunts certain localities of this kind in Norfolk, where the reed-warbler delights to hang its nest in the reeds. These two birds, however, are outside the "Son of the Marshes" province in this book. All the other birds named, together with swans, ducks, divers, and geese, are pleasantly described, so as to gratify every lover of nature, whether an ornithologist or not. Technical distinctions are added to each chapter, which the reader can skip if he chooses. Seeing that such water-loving birds as the avocet, the bittern, the white spoonbill, and the noble bustard are now practically extinct in Great Britain, it is well to have authentic memories of them put on record. Is the writer correct, by the way, in his statement that thirty miles south of Dorking there are old haunts of the last-named bird still visited by solitary members of the species? Any one who has tried to shoot a curlew will appreciate the coast saying, that a man who has killed seven curlews has killed enough for a lifetime. Yet the "Son of the Marshes" has known six shot at one discharge of a shoulder gun, and, what is more, retrieved by the gunner plunging into rough water for them. Most men will smile at his sly wonder as to when a woodcock is considered to be out of range. He ably defends the heron, too, when charged with slaughtering trout. But for this and many more scraps of practical natural history and folklore the reader must be referred to this excellent volume.

It is obvious to compare the "Son of the Marshes" with the late Richard Jefferies. Both possess an intense love of nature, and are quick to discern traits in bird and beast, and discover singular interest and beauty in the common sights and sounds of the country. But the "Son of the Marshes" is nothing if he be not picturesque. He places his readers in scenes and among birds in such a vivid manner that they can easily realise, and often reproduce, the spectacle for themselves. Jefferies, on the other hand, had a finer sense of particulars, and was not so careful with the general effect of his picture. When human interests are superadded, the "Son of the Marshes" is infinitely superior. His "coy-men," gunners, and bog-trotters are full of individuality and energy. Witness the narrow escape from drowning of "Shoemaker Splashy" in this volume, and the half sad, half taciturn lives of the inhabitants of this grey paradise for fowlers. The nearest approach to this in Jefferies is his pathetic account of Hodge's death in the workhouse. In short, the "Son of the Marshes" is the greater artist, Jefferies the more skilled observer, though he is closely run in this last book of his fellow-labourer among birds.

The illustrations of birds by Mr. Brian Hook are bold and telling, forming a distinct ornament to these delightful pages. Sea birds are of a more roving disposition than the ordinary migrants of the woods and gardens, and the author has evidently found it a labour of love to describe the "varias pelagi volucres, et quae Asia circum Dulcibus in stagnis rimantur prata Caystri."

His pages are a well-marked contribution towards the better knowledge of these birds, and cannot but charm all who are fond of native wild fowl and their watery haunts.

M. G. WATKINS.

PHILOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Vorgeschichte der Indoeuropäer. By Rudolph von Ihering. (Leipzig: Breitkopf.) This elaborate account of the pre-historic Indo-Europeans and their culture was interrupted by the untimely death of the author, but it has been admirably edited by Dr. Ehrenberg. It is full of suggestiveness and philosophical reflection, but whether it was worth publishing in its present condition is doubtful. As the editor not obscurely hints, a considerable number of the supposed facts on which it is based have been set aside by the advance of science. The Asiatic home of the primeval Aryan has passed into the limbo of discredited theories, and the second edition of Prof. O. Schrader's Sprachvergleichung und Urgeschichte (1890) has given the coup de grâce to that general view of early Indo-European life and culture which the book we are reviewing takes for granted. Moreover, as is remarked by the editor, Ihering's knowledge of early Teutonic law and custom (Recht) was very faulty. He has followed Zimmer in making the culture which is reflected in the Rig-Veda as characteristic of the primitive Aryan, whereas it was really on a much higher level than that of the Teutonic or Slavonic peoples at a later time. Equally erroneous is his belief in an early intercourse between the Babylonians and the Aryans of north-western India, though numerous conclusions and inferences are drawn from it. The arguments advanced on behalf of the belief have all been shown to be valueless. The most plausible of them was Zimmer's assertion that the Babylonian mana or "mina" was found in the Veda under the form of mana. Mana, however, does not possess the signification assigned to it; and the other Aryan words, like athiras or the hypothetical gharata, which have been compared with words of similar meaning in the Semitic languages, are really unrelated to the latter. In any case, even if it could be shown that some kind of intercourse may have existed in early times between the mouths of the Indus and the Persian Gulf, Ihering's argument would not be helped. Long before the Sanskrit-speaking Aryans entered India they had left the parent-stock, and consequently any intercourse they may have had with Babylonia subsequent to that event could have had no bearing on primitive Indo-European culture.

L'état religieux de la Grèce et de l'Orient au Siècle d'Alexandre: Les Régions syro-babyloniennes et l'Éran. By M. Robiou. (Paris: Klincksieck.) This is a valuable contribution to the history of religion in Western Asia in the age of Alexander. The first and smaller half of the work is occupied with a sketch of religion in Syria and Babylonia, in which the worship of Baal and Ashtoreth, and a belief in the cosmogonic systems of Sanchuniathon, or his Greek interpreter Philo Byblus, played an important part. Full use is made of the inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar and the sarcophagus of Eshmunazar, as well as of the fragments of Berossos. The second half of the volume is especially valuable. In this the sacred books of Zoroastrianism, including the inscriptions of the Achaemenian kings, are examined with a view to tracing in them a consistent and rational history of the Avestan faith; and very sufficient reasons are given for rejecting Darmesteter's revolutionary doctrine of their late origin. It is shown that the Yeshu really mark a lower and degenerate form of Zoroastrian religion, due in great measure to foreign influence, but in strict accordance with classical testimony.

Genesis and Semitic Tradition. By John D. Davis. (David Nutt.) Prof. Davis is evidently not an Assyriologist, and his handling of the results published by Assyrian scholars is that of an amateur. He does not possess that knowledge of the texts which would have enabled him to distinguish between the certain and the uncertain, or to feel instinctively what is possible and what is not. Consequently, his criticisms and conclusions have but little weight, and they are without the attraction even of an interesting style. The chapter on the Sabbath is a good illustration of his want of real grasp of his subject and sympathy with Oriental modes of thought. It is instructive to compare his work with Gunkel's Schöpfung und Chaos which has had the advantage of the assistance of so accomplished an Assyriologist as Dr. Zimmern.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE RESTORED PRONUNCIATION OF LATIN AND GREEK."

Liverpool: Dec. 23, 1895.

Attention was recently directed by the ACADEMY to a pamphlet bearing the above title, which has been issued by Profs. Arnold (Bangor) and Conway (Cardiff) with the unanimous assent of their colleagues, the classical professors in the Welsh University. A manifesto so supported compels attention upon practical grounds; and as criticism is specially invited, a few words of comment on the projected restorations are here offered.

Of the Latin restorations little need be said. They are the work of two accomplished Latinists, and naturally afford very little scope for objection. They go beyond the partially reformed pronunciation already adopted in many schools—chiefly in giving to ae, oe, v, the sounds of ai (in its Greek value), oi, and u. The values thus given to the two diphthongs are probably a little too archaic to be quite Ciceronian; but they are good teachable values, and their adoption will restore to Latin that scope of vocalic melody which it subsequently lost.

The rest of the pamphlet, however, is far from being of the same merit. It consists of a scheme of "restored" Greek pronunciation, together with phonetic explanations: and though it is refreshing to see "gallant little Wales" attacking and settling—after a fashion—a problem which might well engage the united learning of Oxford, Paris, and Berlin, it is greatly to be feared that one half of the "restored" pronunciations are exceedingly doubtful, and that the phonetic explanations contain many serious errors. Nevertheless, thanks are due to Profs. Arnold and Conway for having put forward, although with somewhat over-weening confidence, this scheme of restoration. Everyone admits that Greek pronunciation must some day be reformed; and there are others, doubtless, outside the Welsh University, who are quite ready to affirm that "we can in the main reproduce with certainty the sounds actually heard at Athens in the fifth century B.C." But the misfortune is that these cocksure authorities flatly contradict one another, while the highest authorities are not cocksure, and perhaps never will be. It was probably a mistake to commit to a sub-committee of two a task sufficient for the learning of ten, including experts in Hellenic, epigraphic, and phonetic studies; but, in a practical question of this kind, it is much to have a body of definite proposals put forward as a basis for discussion, and it may be that the Welsh University has thus done more for the reform of Greek pronunciation than could possibly have been done in any other way.

But there is also a tutorial side to this controversy. When the true sounds of ancient Greek shall all have been accurately determined, there will still remain the further question whether all that is thus discovered can profitably be taught. Prof. Blass, for example (whom the Welsh professors take as their chief guide), considers that the Greek long o (ω) was an open o (= Eng. awe), and that their short o was a close o (Eng. oh); and these pronunciations are actually recommended among those here given. But these pronunciations are diametrically opposed to the native habitudes both of English and German students, their long o being always "close" and their short o "open." What, therefore, as a teacher, does Bliss himself say? "I am not of opinion, however, that we ought in practice to exercise ourselves or our pupils in this mode of pronunciation; there could not be a more mischievous waste of time." (Purton's Trans., p. 27.)

It is partly on these grounds that I desire to enter a caveat against the hard and fast adoption of the fifth century B.C. as the standard period of Greek pronunciation. Why the fifth rather than, e.g., the fourth? We surely need not wish to be more Attic than Demosthenes or Plato. And in any case we cannot create a system which will be equally suitable to all ancient authors of every period and dialect. No one, surely, will push "restoration" so far as to invent a different system of pronunciation for each author, according to his age and country. Our system must be one; and it is therefore right that within reasonable limits it should be somewhat eclectic. There is good reason to believe that the fourth and fifth centuries B.C. formed a period of relatively rapid change in Greek pronunciation; but there can be no greater harm in pronouncing the tragedians after the fashion of the orators than in pronouncing the orators after the fashion of the tragedians, or than there is in pronouncing Shakespeare after the fashion of Gladstone and Bright. In the fourth century the difference between ε and η, ο and ω had become one of quantity only, not of quality. Why need we go out of our way to "restore" an obsolescent distinction between them? Suppose some pedant wished to "restore" the distinction of ο and ου, ε and ει in the pronunciation of Shakespeare, what should we say to him? The instances given above are not the only ones in which a wise eclecticism is possible.

Any reform, to be really useful, ought to be international. It is far less important that we shall speak so as to be understood by the ghost of Euripides or of Aristotle than that we shall speak so as to be understood by each other. Let us get rid, by all means, of itacism, and of anything else which is a positive disfigurement of the ancient language, and let us adhere to the pronunciations of the fourth and fifth centuries as closely as we know how. The boundaries of our ignorance are sufficiently wide to afford a very considerable discretion. But, above all, let us strive towards a system of sounds which will be acceptable and teachable not only in Wales, but everywhere.

I should have liked to say something about the proposed pronunciations of ζ, φ, θ, χ, and also about accentuation; but space will not now permit. I will conclude by justifying the assertion that the phonetic "explanations" given in this pamphlet contain serious errors. The two pages 13 and 14 alone furnish four: (1) m, n, l, r are classed as fricative (i.e., frictional) sounds, though three of them owe no part of their characteristic sound to friction, but are purely resonant; (2) l is said to be usually a trill, which it never is, except, perhaps, in Japanese; (3) European languages are said to possess more vowels than consonants, but this is certainly untrue of most of them; (4) the elision of Latin syllables ending in m is so clumsily explained as to appear to say that the vowel is elided first and nasalised afterwards, or perhaps simultaneously.

Such things as this last are recorded to have occurred—in Wonderland: there was a Cheshire cat whose grin survived the animal.

"FOCILE" IN ANATOMY.

London: Jan. 8, 1896.

The Medieval Latin word foecile, meaning each of the two bones of the forearm (the radius and ulna), and each of the corresponding bones of the leg (the tibia and fibula), has not, so far as I know, hitherto been correctly accounted for, though, as it was adopted in all the Romanic languages and in English, several attempts at etymology have been made. MM. Hatzfeld and Thomas, in their excellent French dictionary now in course of publication, say that the origin of the word is unknown. The Century Dictionary correctly identifies the word with foecile, a steel for striking fire with a flint, represented in French by fusil; but unfortunately goes on to suggest that the anatomical application arose from a confusion of foecile, "fire-steel," with the homophonous foecile, "spindle," representing the Latin fuillus. The true explanation is very different. The Arabic word zand (dual zandān) meant primarily one of a pair of sticks used for producing fire by friction. The thinner of these was called "the upper zand," the thicker, which was perforated, "the lower zand." The Arabian anatomists applied these names, from similarity of shape, to the two bones of the forearm and the similar bones of the leg. Their Latin translators did not, in this case, as they so often did, adopt the Arabic word, but translated it by the word that corresponded to it in its primary sense. Probably they knew nothing about fire-sticks; but they knew that zand originally meant a contrivance for producing fire, so that foecile was the nearest equivalent they could find. In the Latin translation of Avicenna's Canon the plural foecilia renders the zandān of the original, while the separate bones of the pair are called respectively foecile superius and foecile inferius.

OBITUARY.

WE regret to record the death, on Wednesday, January 8, of Mr. Hugh Miller, an officer of the Geological Survey of Scotland, who had recently been working among the rocks of the Old Red Sandstone system, with which his father's name is so intimately associated. Mr. Miller was born in 1850, and became attached to the Survey in 1874.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE Helmholtz Memorial Lecture of the Chemical Society will be delivered by Prof. G. F. Fitzgerald, of Dublin, on January 23, at Burlington House.

THREE societies will hold their annual meeting next week. At the Royal Meteorological, an address is to be delivered by the president, Mr. R. Inwards, on "Meteorological Observations," illustrated with lantern slides; at the Royal Microscopical, the presidential address is to be given by Mr. A. D. Michael; and at the Institution of Civil Engineers, by Dr. John Hopkinson.

THE Friday evening meetings at the Royal Institution will begin on January 17, when Lord Rayleigh will deliver a discourse, entitled "More about Argon."

THE subject of the Sunday Lecture, to be delivered to-morrow at St. George's Hall, Langham-place, by Prof. Percy Frankland, is "Pasteur and his Work," with oxy-hydrogen lantern illustrations.

THE Zoological Society of Berlin has in contemplation an important work, which will be entitled Das Tierreich: eine Zusammenstellung und Kennzeichnung der rezenten Tierformen, intended to give on a uniform plan descriptions of all the known species of the animal kingdom, together with their distribution and most important synonymy. Prof. F. E. Schultze, of Berlin, has undertaken the general editorship, assisted by specialists in the different branches of zoology.

WE regret that, in the ACADEMY of last week, the Christian name of the new scientific knight, Prof. Sir Joseph Prestwich, was erroneously given as "John."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

AT the anniversary meeting of the Society of Biblical Archaeology, to be held on Tuesday next at 37, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, the Rev. Dr. M. Gaster will read a paper on "A Unique Hebrew Illuminated MS. of the Bible of the Ninth or Tenth Century."

AT the meeting of the Royal Asiatic Society on Tuesday next, Mr. George Phillips, late of the China Consular Service, will read a paper on "Mahuan's Account of Cochín, Calicut, and Aden in the Fifteenth Century."

A COURSE of lectures on English Philology, with special reference to Old English, to be followed by study of poems by Cynewulf, will be delivered by Dr. Gregory Foster, at University College, Gower-street, on Mondays and Fridays, at 4 p.m., beginning on January 17.

THE Académie des Inscriptions has just elected three correspondants étrangers, to fill the vacancies caused by the death of Reginald Stuart Poole and Rudolf von Roth, and by the promotion of Prof. Mommsen to the rank of associé étranger. Those elected were: (1) Ramkrishna Gopal Bhandarkar, professor of Sanskrit at the Deccan College, Poona—who is, we believe, the first native of India to receive such a distinction, which he has fairly earned by the European accuracy of his scholarship, under the training of Kielhorn and Bühler; (2) Otto Beudorf, professor of archaeology and keeper of the archaeological museum at Vienna; and (3) Adolf Kirchhoff, professor of classics and joint-director of the philological seminar at Berlin.

AT the same meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Schlumberger was elected president, and M. Héron de Villefosse vice-president, for the current year.

Number VI. of the Oriental Catalogues issued by Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co. deals with African languages, excluding, by the way, Egyptian and Arabic. The first section contains works on African philology and linguistics generally; then follow lists of dictionaries, grammars, reading-books, &c., of the several languages in alphabetical order. Though these lists are far from exhaustive, they give some idea of the work that missionaries and scholars have accomplished in introducing light into the Dark Continent.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Tuesday, December 17.)

SIR W. H. FLOWER, president, in the chair.—Dr. Donaldson Smith offered some remarks on the animals observed by him during his recent journey to Lakes Rudolf and Stephanie, and alluded especially to the species of zebras and antelopes encountered during his journey.—Mr. Slater exhibited and made remarks on the head of an antelope obtained in Kavirondo, British East Africa, by Mr. E. Gedge. This antelope had been hitherto usually identified with the "Kob" of Western Africa, but appeared to belong to a distinct species, to which the name Cobus thomasi had been given by Herr Neumann.—A communication was read from Mr. Oldfield Thomas, on Camelotus, a still-existing survivor of the Epa-northidae of Ameghino, and the representative of a new family of recent marsupials. The specimen upon which the new genus and species (Casolestes obscurus) was based had been received from Bogota. The mammal described by Toms in 1860 as Hyrracodon fuliginosus from Ecuador was a second species of the same genus; but the name Hyrracodon had been preoccupied, so that Casolestes was proposed in its place.

METEOROLOGICAL.—(Wednesday, Dec. 18.)

R. INWARDS, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. R. H. Scott read a paper on "Some of the Differences between Fogs, as related to the Weather Systems which accompany Them." In this it was shown there are at least two distinct classes of phenomena described under the generic name of "fog." In the case of anticyclonic fogs no rainfall takes place, the temperature is low in the morning, and there is a considerable rise of temperature during the day; while in the case of cyclonic fogs rainfall does take place, and the temperature is high in the morning, frequently approaching or even equalling the maximum for the day. Mr. Scott also investigated the cases of several well-marked fogs in London, and found that there was no direct relation traceable between the temperature accompanying them and the death-rate.—Mr. Scott also exhibited some specimens of the illustrations in the "International Cloud Atlas," which is now being prepared for publication.

HISTORICAL.—(Thursday, December 19.)

SIR M. E. GRANT DUFF, president, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. O. Raymond Beasley on "Early Christian Travel before the Crusades." A discussion followed, in which the Rev. W. H. Hutton and Mr. J. Foster Palmer took part. The paper, which contained an exhaustive account of the several sources of information available, has been recommended by the council to be printed in the next volume of the society's Transactions.

FINE ART.

OLD MASTERS AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

I.

THOUGH the finest things in the Winter Exhibition of the Royal Academy are already tolerably familiar, not only to the student but to the public, the collection as a whole is one of great and varied interest. The displays of the last few years have accustomed us to be thankful for very small mercies where Italian art of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries is in question. This winter, however, if the Academy had not come to the rescue with the two most important works from the Diploma Gallery—the "Cartoon of St. Anne," by Leonardo da Vinci, and the Giorgionesque "Temperance"—the Italian pictures would be altogether below the usual average, even of the later exhibitions.

The lovers of Netherlandish art in its splendid climax, during the seventeenth century, will no longer find Gallery No. II. devoted to their favourite painters. It is worthily occupied by a restricted, yet comprehensive, series of French pictures, beginning with Gaspar Poussin—as we call Gaspar Dughet over here—comprising examples of Watteau, Pater, Boucher, Tocqué, Fragonard, and Greuze, and then going on through the nineteenth century with Géricault, Delacroix, Decamps, Delaroche, Jules Dupré, Marilhat, Théodore Rousseau, Millet, Troyon, Diaz, Daubigny, and finally Meissonier and Bastien-Lepage. So at last the Barbizon school, which, by the way, as regards its protagonists, was not a school at all, but a friendly group of gifted artists, each working out his ideal independently of the others, has obtained efficient recognition. Barbizon painters—we maintain the designation for the sake of convenience only—cannot rise much higher than they stand already in the estimation of those who worship what is noblest in art, and at the same time most expressive of their own time in its higher aspect. It is the Academy itself which must be congratulated on having conceded, though it may be a little tardily and under outside pressure, that Corot, Millet, Théodore Rousseau, Troyon, and Daubigny, if not yet old masters, are at any rate masters. At the same time, let it be remembered that official recognition was the last thing achieved by these great landscape painters in their own country, and that it was for a long time but grudgingly accorded. The successive international exhibitions did more to advance their fame than the annual Salons or the patronage of the state. The Louvre has suffered much from the failure to appreciate while it was yet time the real worth of this section of the modern French school. It is only now that the gaps on the walls of the great state museum are beginning to be worthily filled up, in a measure through the generosity of individuals. The next step—and it is one which cannot long be delayed—is the admission of deceased French masters of the nineteenth century to the National Gallery. Here, however, the exorbitant prices commanded just now for pictures of this class will necessarily prove a serious obstacle.

The English masters of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries are not less numerous or less delightful than heretofore.

To many people the most interesting part of the whole display is that of goldsmith's and silversmith's work in the Water-colour Room. This is intended "to illustrate the art of the English sculptor-goldsmith, chiefly in its relation to the production of plate and other objects for the requirements of ecclesiastical, collegiate, and corporate institutions."

Though most of the precious objects here temporarily grouped together are well-known, and have been accurately described by specialists, their juxtaposition may, all the same, have important results. It will certainly immensely enhance the reputation of the English goldsmiths of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, some of whose achievements, as here displayed, appear worthy in style and technique to be compared on equal terms with the best work of their skilled contemporaries abroad.

Among the examples of Tuscan art of the fourteenth century there are some pretty things, though nothing of commanding merit. The attribution of the interesting diptych, with the "Crucifixion" and the "Descent from the Cross" (Mr. R. H. Benson), to the great Ambrogio Lorenzetti himself, does not convince, but we have nothing better at present to put in its place. The "Virgin and Child" (Mr. Charles Butler) appears, on the other hand, to be rightly attributed to Taddeo Gaddi, whose peculiar interpretation of the Giottesque types and formulae is well displayed. It is probably by some slip that the catalogue ascribes to the Umbrian school a "Death of the Virgin," which is clearly of Tuscan origin. The name of Filippo Lippi is no doubt intended merely to describe the class to which belongs the "Virgin, Child, and St. John" (same collection), clearly by some one of his more capable scholars. Variations of the same design are in the National Gallery and the Gallery of Naples; but this example has considerable strength and distinctiveness of style. From the same collection comes the interesting panel, "Scenes illustrating the Fable of Cupid and Psyche," by a not first-rate craftsman of Florence working in the last quarter of the fifteenth century. Herr Richard Förster gives, in the most recent number of the Jahrbuch der Preussischen Kunstsammlungen, the exhaustive analysis of a precisely similar picture belonging to Mr. R. Brinsley Marlay, pointing out its importance as being the first Italian work in order of date in which the charming legend elaborated by Apuleius is treated. Florentine, again, appears to us to be the gaily coloured "Virgin and Child" (Mr. Charles Butler) erroneously assigned to Pinturicchio, though the Florentine or Umbro-Florentine who painted it owes, it may be, something to the Umbrian master just mentioned. In connexion with it we put forward, not without hesitation, the name of that curious painter, Raffaele de' Capponi, by whom there is a picture—signed, and dated 1500—in the gallery of the Sta. Maria Nuova Hospital at Florence. In the latter the central motive has been borrowed from Pinturicchio's great altar-piece in the gallery of Perugia. Considerable interest attaches to a little "St. Jerome" (Mr. Charles Butler), which is here assigned to the German school. The style is certainly Netherlandish, of the fifteenth century; but a closer examination reveals signs of a southern hand, especially in the modelling of the head, and in the execution of architectural and other details, which is less sure and accurate than a Fleming would have made it. It may well be that we have here an example of the school which under Flemish influence arose in Naples during the fifteenth century. There are some curious points of contact between this little panel and the famous "St. Jerome in his Study" of Antonello da Messina, which has passed from Lord Northbrook's collection into the National Gallery. The style is in Mr. Butler's picture earlier and more gothic, the hand far less accomplished; but the relation of the two paintings is one which deserves to be investigated.

A curious panel, "David with the Head of Goliath, and Judith with the Head of Holofernes" (same collection), is put down, with a query, to Albert Dürer—an ascription which, even with this note of interrogation, nothing can excuse. It would hardly be possible in the whole range of art to find a name more inappropriate. This quaint and, in its way, very charming little piece is beyond reasonable doubt by one of those numerous Flemings who, in the early sixteenth century, strove to assimilate the graces of the Milanese school, and by one of the most accomplished among them. It is not Leonardo himself, but some lesser luminary of the group who has this time inspired the northern painter. A really beautiful work, though again in our opinion not rightly named, is the "St. Catherine" (Mr. T. Humphry Ward) ascribed to Bernardino Luini. It is the counterpart in every respect of the "St. Catherine" catalogued as by Luini at Hampton Court (No. 259), but finer in colour than that picture. Both are by a Milanese painter much more closely associated with Da Vinci than Luini ever was—Gian Petрино, or more accurately, Giovanni Pietro Ricci. What seems Eutruque in the suavity and composure of the saint is no less characteristic of Gian Petрино, from whom Luini may, indeed, have taken this development of the Leonardesque style. The enamel-like surface, the painting of the red hair and the crimson draperies, the type of the hands, all suggest the less known, but not less accomplished, follower of Leonardo, to whom we owe the "Colombina" of the Hermitage, and a good many other fine things. The great "Cartoon of St. Anne" it will not be necessary to discuss again on the present occasion; or, rather, it deserves exhaustive discussion, such as cannot for the moment be accorded to it. The most important in dimensions of Da Vinci's extant designs, it is infinitely truer and more beautiful, so far as it goes, than the widely divergent "Virgin and Child, with St. Anne," of the Salon Carré in the Louvre, which presents an entirely revised, but not improved, version of the original conception. The "Virgin and Child, with Saints," lent by the Duke of Westminster to the Venetian Exhibition as a Giovanni Bellini, reappears here after too short an interval under the same designation, although it was then immediately recognised as being an excellent old copy of the early picture by Lorenzo Lotto at Bridgewater.

House. Another copy of considerably less merit was acquired a few years ago by the Dresden Gallery as an original, but has now been recognised as what it is, and translated to the skies. The beautiful Giorgionesque "Temperance" (Diploma Gallery) again presents itself as a problem not easy of solution. We may recognise at once that the execution, though it has much of the charm which belongs to the school in its early prime, cannot be the master's own; yet we shall not easily get beyond mere conjecture at present when we seek for the name of the true author.

Some curious puzzles are presented by the so-called "Titian and Franceschini" (H.M. the Queen, from Windsor Castle). This picture was in Charles I.'s collection, and is described in Vanderdoort's catalogue as "The picture of Titian by himself, and his friend with him, in a red velvet gown, being one of the Senators of Venice—half figures." The figure of Titian is an afterthought, painted in by an entirely different and apparently later hand, and copied either from the original portrait by the master in Berlin, or the similar picture at the Uffizi. The "Franceschini" or "Franceschi" is a much finer specimen of Venetian art than the "Titian," to which it stands, moreover, in no definite relation, but it is not to be reconciled in style with any late work by the master. The large canvas entitled here "Il Paradiso" (Colonel Ralph Vivian) has manifestly nothing to do with Tintoretto's gigantic canvas in the Sala del Consiglio of the Doges' Palace, the finest sketch for which is that in the Louvre, while another of varying design is to be found in the Gallery of the Prado. This painting recalls the style of Palma Giovine rather than that of Tintoretto. Who, again, will venture to accept unconditionally the ascription to the last-named great master of the two unfinished designs in oils lent by Mr. Ruskin? It may seem almost sacrilegious to question the judgment of the writer who, of all others, has done most to raise the reputation of Tintoretto to a height at which it cannot uniformly sustain itself. And yet it is impossible to accept these unfinished canvases as adequate productions of his brush. In the "Doge in Prayer" there is dash without real strength or decision. The portrait-like figure of the Alvise Mocenigo kneeling in the centre of the picture has something small and mean—not only in dimensions—which one finds it hard to associate with Robusti, even when he is least inspired.

From all these denials and disparagements, necessarily involved in a consideration of the Italian pictures at Burlington House, it is pleasant to turn to Mr. R. H. Benson's exquisite, though not well-preserved, Correggio, "Christ taking leave of his Mother before the Passion." This dates quite early among the works of the master, and must be placed, if anything, before the great "Madonna and Child, with St. Francis," of the Dresden Gallery. Nowhere else has Correggio shown a tenderness so deep and so little marred by his characteristic exaggeration of grace and charm. Even here it begins to peep forth, but does not unpleasantly give colour to the whole, as later on it will do. How is it possible, studying this picture without parti pris, to deny the Ferrarese-Bolognese origin of Correggio's art, first established by Giovanni Morelli? Montegna has supplied him with certain types and motives, but with nothing of his virile force, or his measured grandeur of style.

Notwithstanding its characteristic hardness of modelling and texture, there is a singular power and vitality in the "Portrait of Don Garcia de Medici" (sic), by Bronzino, lent by the Earl of Rosebery. The picture comes as near to charm of colour as anything Florentine of this particular time can do.

EXCAVATIONS IN CYPRUS.

We quote the following from the Times:

"Following up their excavations at Amathus in 1894, the Trustees of the British Museum chose for their field of operation in 1895 the site of Curium, which General Cesnola's discoveries made famous a number of years ago. It was known that he had left certain spots untouched. These have now been explored under the direction of Mr. H. B. Walters. The results are exhibited temporarily in the Etruscan Saloon.

"The ancient town of Curium was built on the summit of a rocky elevation some 300 ft. above the sea, and was almost inaccessible on three sides; the rock is of calcareous sandstone, and has been cut on the east and south sides into a perpendicular face. The whole extent of this elevation is covered with debris of buildings. The tomb-area is very extensive. Beginning with the rock-cut tombs, many hundreds of which are seen in the south wall of the Acropolis, long ago explored and emptied, tombs of all periods are found over the low-lying ground extending about half a mile south of the Acropolis, and in less numbers on the adjoining hill-slopes.

"But the special feature of the recent excavations was the discovery of a necropolis dating from what is called the Mycenaean period, and thus apparently confirming the statement of Strabo that Curium had originally been founded by a colony from Argos. It would seem that this cemetery, which lies on the side of a low hill to the east of the village of Episcopi, represents the site of the original Argive or Mycenaean foundation, and that the city had been transferred to the site now known as the Acropolis towards the end of the sixth century B.C., that being the date of the earliest tombs there.

"In the Mycenaean tombs, along with pottery of the kind usually known by that name, was found a considerable quantity of rude and primitive pottery of local make, such as is found in Cypriot tombs of the pre-Phoenician period. These vases are hand-made, and decorated either with patterns in white or in relief on a dark ground, or with simple black patterns on a creamy ground. The Mycenaean vases are mostly of a character familiar from Dr. Schliemann's discoveries; but among them are also some specimens of remarkable rarity, in particular two large vases which belong to a class previously known only by four examples, found on pre-Phoenician sites in Cyprus and a fragment at Nauplia in Greece. The method of decoration is purely Mycenaean, and the clay is probably of an imported kind; but the style of the figures is decidedly rude and betrays local influence. On both vases we have human figures in two-horse chariots, painted in black on a bright buff ground, and on one is a series of female figures in panels divided by borders, a style of decoration hitherto unknown. The field of each vase is covered with ornaments characteristic of this period. Of vases of the lilyos type, we have a tall, elegant, two-handled cup, painted with cuttle fish, and a funnel-shaped vase decorated with murex shells. Another very remarkable and almost unique vase is of a shape known as pseudamphora, the mouth being covered up and a spout in the side used instead; this vase is decorated with an octopus on either side. In one tomb was found, along with two or three Mycenaean vases of the ordinary type, a sard scarab with Egyptian hieroglyphs, which has been pronounced by competent authorities to bear the name of Khonsu, a deity that was not introduced into Egypt until the XXVth Dynasty (666-527 B.C.); moreover, neither the shape nor the material of the gem is such as we are accustomed to associate with an earlier date than the seventh century B.C. In another tomb a Phoenician cylinder was found, with a design of a late conventionalised character, which cannot be dated earlier than 600 B.C., and with it were some gold ornaments of a common Mycenaean type. But incomparably the most important object in these finds is a small steatite scaraboid, on which is an intaglio design of a bull lying down. The work is very admirable, the drawing most masterly, recalling the famous Vaphio gold cups in the museum at Athens. From the shape of the stone and the technical skill employed, it is evident that this gem must belong to a very advanced period of Mycenaean art, possibly as late as 700 B.C. Other gems which may be mentioned are a scarab of Thothmes III., found in a tomb of recent date; a scaraboid with an ibex; and an archaic scaraboid gem set in a silver ring, representing Herakles running. In the later or sixth century Curium, one particular site proved to be rich in gold ornaments. It seems very probable that Cesnola's treasure was originally gathered for the most part on this site, and this opinion has been shared by other explorers subsequent to his time. Besides sundry finger rings, earrings, and similar ornaments, a fine pair of bronze bracelets plated with gold, ending in ram's heads, should be mentioned; also a gold chain necklace of very delicate workmanship. The only bronze object that calls for special mention was an archaic Greek statuette of a female figure, dating from the sixth century; it had formed part of an elaborate lamp stand.

"Among the vases found in the later tombs is a large hydria (pitcher) of black glazed ware, on which figures are painted in thick white, with details marked in yellow. Many vases with similar decoration but of inferior execution have been found in Southern Italy, and are supposed to have been made at Tarentum; but probably this vase may be claimed as genuine Greek manufacture.

"On the site of what appears to have been a temple to Demeter and Kore was found a Greek inscription, which has the peculiar interest of being written first in the ordinary Greek letters, and next in the Cypriot syllabary or local alphabet, in which each sign represents, not a single letter, but a syllable—e.g., the first word Δήμητρι is written da-mu-ti-ri, each two letters being represented by one character.

"For the coming season it has been decided by the authorities of the Museum to try a new site, where it is hoped that further evidence may be obtained bearing on the early history of Cyprus."

"THE ETCHED WORK OF REMBRANDT."

WITH reference to our brief notice (ACADEMY, December 28) of his lecture on "The Etched Work of Rembrandt," Sir F. Seymour Haden asks us to reproduce the actual expressions he employed in describing the six groups of plates executed in the studio of Rembrandt, to which he has taken more or less exception:

"The first of these groups consists chiefly of early heads, as well as of a number of beggars, which will be seen, on comparing them with genuine plates, to be by inferior hands.

"The second, of a series of small plates evidently after pictures or compositions by Rembrandt, and all of them engraved apparently by the same hand, which, however, is not the hand of Rembrandt.

"The third, of a certain number of ambitious and, as to size, important plates, executed at about the same time and already described in the 'Monograph' (pp. 24-29), which, till the Burlington Club exhibition, enjoyed a world-wide reputation and commanded a large price, but which now, by common consent, are regarded not only as copies, but as copies in the correction of which Rembrandt had taken little or no appreciable part.

"The fourth, of plates portions only of which are by Rembrandt, and the rest by assistants.

"The fifth, of a certain number of later plates which, though by Rembrandt, are adaptations of or founded on the designs of others.

"The sixth, of plates—many of them landscapes—attributed without the least apparent warrant to Rembrandt, but which still figure as his in collections arranged according to Bartsch's Catalogue."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT KINGDOM TOMBS AT THEBES.

Maison Yusef Hassan: Dec. 18, 1895.

As no monuments of the Ancient Kingdom have hitherto been found at Thebes, it may be of interest to readers of the ACADEMY to know that I have discovered in the northern Asasif two tombs which without doubt belong to this early period. One of them is the tomb of a "governor of the nome" whose "good name" (ren-ef nefer) was Ahy: the scenes in it are executed in relief and well preserved. The other is in a very mutilated condition, but I hope before long to make out most of the inscriptions in it.

I have also made many other important finds in the Theban necropolis this autumn; but perhaps the most interesting is the discovery of a parallel text to the one in the tomb of Rekhmara, giving the duties of the Wesir of Thebes. By this new text I can restore much that is defective in the Rekhmara inscription.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE Lords of the Committee of Council on Education have directed the formation, at the Bethnal Green Museum, of a loan collection of examples of English furniture and figured silks of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which will be opened in April, 1896, in the galleries recently occupied by the National Portraits. In order to ensure the formation of a thoroughly representative collection, the assistance has been invited of a number of gentlemen qualified by their knowledge to advise with regard to these branches of industrial art, which still form, as they did in the past, the main handicrafts of the East of London. Recent changes of fashion have caused a demand for eighteenth century patterns in figured silks, the manufacture of which formerly gave employment to 60,000 weavers in the East of London, and the designs of the early days of George III. are now being revived or adapted. Possessors of dresses and costumes made of these silks will be invited to lend them for exhibition; and, as eighteenth century trade pattern books—which attach to cut examples of the silks the names of weavers and merchants—will be included, comparisons between the designs in these samples and the patterns in the old costumes will probably lead to greater accuracy in dating the English figured silks already in the possession of the Museum. The loan collection will remain open for six months; and, in addition, the Bethnal Green Museum will be enriched by the generous loan by Sir Wollaston Franks of his collection of European porcelain, and by the Chantrey Bequest collection of pictures lent by the Royal Academy.

Two exhibitions will be opened next week at the Dowdeswell Galleries, in New Bond-street: a collection of studies in pastel, by Mrs. Ernest Hart, entitled "Glories of the Sky and Sea in the Far East"; and a series of paintings, by Mr. George Carline, of "The Home of our English Wild Flowers."

At a meeting of the Society of Arts, to be held on Tuesday next, with Dr. Ernest Hart in the chair, Mr. Gleeson White will read a paper on "The Poster and its Artistic Possibilities."

THE annual general meeting of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland will be held at Dublin on Tuesday next, when the Duke of Abercorn is to be proposed as honorary president in succession to Lord Ardilaun. It has been decided by the council to hold the summer meeting at Omagh, with excursions to Ballyshannon, Sligo, and Enniskillen.

WE hear from a correspondent in Cairo, under date December 30, that M. de Morgan, who had just gone to Assuan, proposes to pump out the sacred lake at Karnak. Prof. Sayce, having delivered two very successful public lectures, was to start in a day or two for his usual winter voyage in Upper Egypt; while Miss Brodrick and Miss Edith Simcox were to start at about the same time in the Lotus.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Maspero announced that scarabs and other Egyptian objects had been found at Eleusis, in the course of the excavations conducted by the Archaeological Society of Athens. Unfortunately, all of them prove, on examination, to belong to the Ptolemaic period, being examples of those little amulets which were at that time in favour with the religious. The discovery, therefore, lends no direct support to M. Foucart's theory (recently mentioned in the ACADEMY), that the origin of the Eleusinian Mysteries is to be traced to early Egyptian influence.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE Popular Concert programme on Monday evening included two great works. The first was Schubert's Quintet in C (Op. 163), for two violins, viola, and two violoncellos. The last movement may not be on the same high level as the others, yet the work deservedly ranks among the composer's finest creations. The rendering, under the leadership of Lady Hallé, was not always satisfactory, particularly in the opening Allegro; but the romantic Adagio received full justice. The other composition was Tschaiikowsky's pianoforte Trio in A minor (Op. 50), written in memory of Nicholas Rubinstein, brother of the great pianist. This work was introduced by the late Sir Charles Hallé, at one of his recitals in 1888. The nobility of the thematic material, enhanced by skilful workmanship, the strong individuality which makes itself felt in every page, and the melancholy charm which characterises so much of the music—these and other qualities render it a work of sterling merit and great attractiveness. The interpretation of the Trio was remarkably fine, though we wish that the pianist, Herr Reisenauer, who contributed so much to the success of the performance, had not taken so many liberties with the text.

MR. BISPHAM gave his second concert at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, the programme being devoted to "English music of modern times." It commenced with a clever and expressive setting of Browning's "Prospice," by Mr. Walford Davies, formerly a pupil, now teacher, at the Royal College of Music. There were songs by Bishop, Dibdin, Shield, Bennett, and living composers, which were sung by Miss E. Palisser and Mr. Bispham, and received with enthusiasm. The Meister Glee Singers gave admirable renderings of glees and part-songs. Mr. Leonard Borwick contributed two short solos, a Field Nocturne, and a bright Presto Capriccioso by the little-known Ed. Baehre. Mr. Gompertz played violin solos, by Dr. Stanford. The concert was a success; yet for all that a programme composed entirely of modern music of any one nationality is not an unqualified pleasure.

J. S. SHERLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

UNDER the title of National Portrait Gallery of British Musicians, Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, & Co. have in the press a work, edited by Dr. John Warriner, of Trinity College, Dublin, which will contain some hundreds of portraits of living musicians, who are either natives of Great Britain and Ireland, or have permanently settled there, together with a short biographical notice of each.

THE jubilee of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" falls due this year, the oratorio having been first performed at the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1846. In commemoration of this event, Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. will shortly publish a History of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," by Mr. F. G. Edwards. The book will contain much original information on the subject, from unpublished letters of Mendelssohn and others, in addition to illustrations, fac-similes, &c.

TIMES.—"It is needless to say that the subject here indicated is peculiarly congenial to Sir John Seeley's genius, and that his treatment of it is eminently suggestive and instructive. TIMES.—"Few persons, if any, since Selden, have done more for English Legal History than Mr. Maitland; Sir Frederick Pollock contributes to the literary partnership a large capital of attainments, and the result is a book which puts an end to a longstanding reproach. It has one rare merit—an absence of pedantry in discussions which too readily lend themselves to that vice..... Written with touches of vivacity and homely directness, the book will not interest lawyers only. Here and there are chapters which all Englishmen would do well to read. They might mark with profit the robust good sense, patience, and prudence which have shaped our common law."

LITERATURE.

STEINMETZ ON THE EVOLUTION OF PUNISHMENT.

Ethnologische Studien zur ersten Entwicklung der Strafe, nebst einer psychologischen Abhandlung über Grausamkeit und Rachsucht. Von Dr. S. R. Steinmetz. (Leiden: Van Doesburgh; Leipzig: Harrassowitz.)

THE central problem of this work is recognised by anthropologists as among the most important in the study of social development. Between the spiteful vengeance of savages and the judicial punishment meted out by the criminal law of civilised nations, lines of continuity appear on the face of the facts. But the evidence had not been sufficiently collected, much less arranged and discussed, to form a basis wide enough for such a world-problem. Dr. Steinmetz undertook this task years ago; and one sees how in the course of the work he found processes of moral, political, and religious development so intricately entwined, that his researches had to spread far over the field of social anthropology. The result is a book which must form part of the working library of all serious students of this vast subject: one destined to produce effects on public opinion of which the first signs are but just coming into view.

Desiring to trace back the law of vengeance to its ultimate source in human nature, Dr. Steinmetz collects in a preliminary inquiry the opinions of psychologists as to man's propensity to cruelty and revenge. At first reading, the motives assigned seem so various and confused that one asks: Would it not have been better to wait till mental analysis is far enough advanced for judging consistently the reasons and purposes of human actions, and in the meantime to let anthropology deal with vengeance as a fact? But, on further following up our author's line of argument, it seems that he was right in pushing at the psychological door to see whether it was open. The motives assigned for revenge vaguely fall into some such sequence as this—blind fury, instinctive combat, joy in the infliction of pain, sense of safety and power as contrasted with the victim's suffering, practical utility of deterring enemies from future attacks. Now this, as is seen by the evidence collected, corresponds vaguely with the stages of savage and barbaric retaliation, beginning with "undirected vengeance." If an Australian baby hurts itself, the father will fall club in hand on the bystanders, though they had nothing to do with the accident. A North-American Indian who cannot get at the man who injured him will kill the first stranger he meets, or vent his murderous passion on a pig. In such fury there arises a tendency to saddle the injury on some hated person, so that it is not unusual among savages that in default of the actual culprit an enemy is sacrificed. This act, more instinctive than purposeful, links itself to that great institution which belongs in its extreme form to the lower culture, the law of blood-feud. This is not undirected but directed vengeance, where one tribe retaliates on another without regard to the individual culprit through whom the offence came. The modern civilised mind, steeped in individualism, can only by an effort enter into the barbaric idea of joint responsibility, which comes naturally to the Australian child who runs for his life when he hears that one of his family has done a murder. Criminal law has made such a conception absurd to us. Yet late history keeps it in view in the stories of Scotch and Irish clans at feud; and it is still implied in the moral theory of war, as national combat in retaliation of national injury. As to this, the most advanced nations have hardly shifted from the rules of savage conduct.

While the utility of vengeance as the primitive means of restraining wrongs and establishing rights is plainly apparent, the counter fact is not less clear, that unchecked and unlimited feud would have gone far toward exterminating mankind. Accordingly, sections of the present work have to deal with mitigated forms of vengeance, where the retribution has to be limited to few persons, or reduced to ceremony. The sham fights of the Australians are typical, where the women rush in when a man is down, crying "Kill him not!" So is the fight with clubs in settlement of a dispute, offended and offender dealing alternate blows till one gives in. The argument here brought forward, that by such half-formal vengeance the disastrous effects of quarrels between kindred or allied peoples are brought to a close without loss of life, opens an instructive chapter of legal development. Among these Australians, regarded as so low in culture, yet showing the germs of many institutions, may be noticed as significant the practice that, in such cases of injury as when a native has carried off the wife of another, he has to stand to receive spears thrown at him by the injured party, warding them off if he can. The transformation of duel into punishment could hardly be better shown.

Educational discipline within the family leads up to legal reformatory punishment by the state. Throughout both, man has availed himself of the acts of vengeance at first arising from anger, which in the course of experience were seen to deter from ill-doing other offenders than those on whom they were inflicted, and to reform the ill-doers themselves when they took the milder form of chastisement. The investigation of the social steps by which educational discipline was developed goes back to the beginnings in a stage of society where such discipline hardly existed. Travellers have wondered at the gentleness with which in many savage tribes the parents treat their children, who grow up in utter freedom. The Macusi never strike a boy: they say beating is for a dog, not for a Macusi. It is praise for a Dayak to say of a boy that he is very wicked, and the American Indians like to see the boys beat their mothers, for they will grow up fierce warriors. But behind such utilitarian explanations there lies the fact that savage families, with all their rough ways, are held together by a bond of unselfish kindness, which is one of the wonders of human nature. Interesting evidence is brought forward by Dr. Steinmetz to show that the majority of tribes who educate with this mildness, which points rather to the mother's than the father's temper, are those who live under the matriarchal system, while it is among patriarchal tribes that instances appear of severe punishment of children, even to a ferocious father dashing a child's head against a rock. But without assuming the matriarchal condition as the earliest state of mankind, it is plain that punishment of the full nature of vengeance can never have prevailed in the primitive family, for it would have destroyed it. As to the later developments of discipline by chastisement these are processes which we moderns can readily understand. The savage war-chief punishes the traitor or coward by his rude martial law, and already in barbaric times the captive set to till the ground in slavery does his task under the lash. Side by side with this there arise, by steps not less intelligible, the deterrent punishments of criminal law, accompanying the organisation of society into systematic government. Not that vengeance for robbery, murder, and the like, are superseded at once by state-law; such mere offences against the individual or the family are for ages left to be dealt with in the old way of retaliation, or compounded for value. But certain crimes against the community come to be punished by the community, especially witchcraft, wherefrom all men's lives are in danger, and violation of the law of exogamy, forbidding marriage between a man and woman of the same clan. In the course of ages, men's minds have changed as to the criminality of these acts; but the principle of punishment by the state has grown and grown, ousting even the primitive rights of vengeance which gave rise to it, and substituting what we moderns are apt to call, with more significance than we are conscious of, the vengeance of the law.

At the beginning and the end of the work are chapters upon vengeance and chastisement as affecting religion, and the reaction of religion on them. Perhaps the earliest contact between religion and morals is made when the departed soul of the slain savage appears in dream to a kinsman, demanding revenge, and only to be appeased by the ancient and widespread rite of sacrificing an enemy on the tomb. Failing this, the ancestral ghost will inflict disease, or famine, or defeat; and even his kindness for his living kindred is apt to take the guise of anger, when he visits with ghostly vengeance those who are neglectful and cruel to their people, who are also his people, and especially such as violate the tribal customs which must not be broken, of which the greatest is: Let vengeance be done. When we pass from ancestor-gods to greater deities, these punish likewise with earthly retribution offences done against themselves by those who have dishonoured them, withheld their sacrifices, broken their laws and ordinances. Even in the savage world it is natural that the murderer should dread the encounter in the spirit-world with the ghosts of his victims, waiting to take their vengeance on him; and here begins the fear of retribution after death. But beyond this, when it comes to stories told among savages of a judgment and retribution for moral good and evil, evidently framed on the ideas of the great culture-religions, with a tribunal for judgment of those who did good and evil, or a way on the right hand to bliss for the good and to the left for the wicked into misery, or a bridge of the dead whence the evildoers fall into the abyss but the good pass over into a land of delight, it seems to the present reviewer that these are no original savage growths. They belong to times far on in the history of religion, when advanced legal and moral institutions have their counterparts transferred to the future life, and, as it is here well expressed, "Earthly judgments come back from the council-chamber of the divine rulers ratified and sanctioned with greater authority than before."

To follow further the lines of argument and criticism opened out in a work of such range and complexity is impossible within the limits of the present notice. But this outline of its contents, meagre as it is, may serve the end of two classes who may read it: those who only require their attention to be called to a research which they will enter into critically for themselves, and the larger class who will never read one of Dr. Steinmetz's thousand pages, but who keep their eyes open to the direction in which ideas are moving.

EDWARD B. TYLOR.

Journals and Correspondence of Lady Eastlake.

Edited by her Nephew, Charles Eastlake Smith. In 2 vols. (John Murray.)

WHATEVER may be the feelings of a reviewer who strives to criticise these volumes truly, he will not have read through many pages before all his mind will have been dominated by profound admiration. For strong and deliberate judgments upon art and literature, in which the personality of the writer is always to be felt, I do not know whom Lady Eastlake may be compared with—except it be with Carlyle, which would be, it must be admitted, a most strange comparison. There is, in reality, little or nothing in common between these two writers; but both impress the reader with the force of broad, massive originality.

The editor is to be congratulated upon the skilful and orderly manner in which he has arranged his materials.

To those who knew her, Lady Eastlake must have been the most interesting figure in the literary and artistic circles of her day. A beautiful woman, with all the strength of Carlyle and the genial humour of Thackeray, she did not feel small even in the society of intellectual giants, but gave out her opinions freely and fearlessly, with the superadded charm of a sweet, womanly mind. It would, moreover, be hard to find a writer—perhaps a female writer especially—who was so absolutely free from cant. In these observations, which some may mistake for mere eulogy, I am endorsing the opinions formed by competent critics of her own day.

Her literary career commenced with the publication of a series of letters to her mother, written in Russia, where she had resided for two years. These letters were published by John Murray, under the title of A Residence on the Shores of the Baltic, in 1841. The MS. had been shown by Murray to Lockhart, who expressed his opinion of it in the following terms:

"I have been reading the manuscript with great admiration for the most part. I wish the lady would score out a few fine words; but beyond this she is unassailable. I have no doubt she is the cleverest female writer now in England, the most original in thought and expression too; and she seems good besides, which, after all, has its charms even for old sinners like you and me."

The young author, when gratefully acknowledging the great critic's kindly approbation, remarks that, strange to say, Lockhart's Life of Scott was the only work of importance she had been reading at the time when she was writing the letters. And, she observes, "I concluded the work with a profound veneration for Sir Walter, and a somewhat lively desire to become acquainted with his biographer."

The mind of this remarkable woman was of a peculiarly fresh and original tone; it retained, too, all its powers unimpaired to the end of a long life. And some practical benefit may be gained by those interested in the education of the young, in looking back to see how it was cultivated.

The father of Elizabeth Rigby—afterwards Lady Eastlake—had visited Italy, Switzerland, and France, in 1789, reaching Paris just at the outbreak of the French Revolution. His Letters from France, &c., edited by his daughter, were published in 1880. Anne Palgrave, her mother, has been described as "a bright, clever, energetic woman. She was a strict disciplinarian as to punctuality, and never allowed her children to have nerves." She died in her ninety-sixth year. Dr. Rigby, we are told,

"encouraged his children to read, and kept them well supplied with books; but he also insisted upon their having plenty of relaxation and exercise. While at Framington for the summer, they enjoyed complete holiday; always out of doors. Playing at every sort of game, climbing trees and haystacks, making fires in a dry ditch, and roasting potatoes."

"Men of literature, agriculture, natural history, science, and other branches of learning, frequently visited Dr. Rigby, and his children had the privilege of mixing freely with such visitors."

Happily for her, holiday tasks and intermediate examinations had not yet been invented. "She was full of fun, and was much laughed at and with for her odd ideas." Prudes and pedants had not suppressed her originality, or "froze the genial currents of the soul."

Miss Rigby describes Bacon's Essays as "a mine of rare thoughts in the most compact language"; and the same might be said with truth of her own Journals. The Edinburgh Journals are worthy of being published alone, in a small volume and at a popular price. I hope some day to see them thus made accessible to many readers. Here we have profound wisdom so combined with the nicest wit and the keenest humour that it never bores. Such, for example, as the following:

"To try and teach a child the existence of a deity by the help of reason, is much the same as to teach him speech by the help of logic. Indeed, reasoning with a child is like trifling with a mob."

"The man of the world who seeks and wins a woman's heart apparently only to wring it, is morally the greater sufferer. In most cases the woman rises from such trials (and let no woman undervalue their exquisite bitterness) purified in heart, strengthened in faith, subdued in will; while the man reaps only a habit of evil, increased by indulgence, and a mind more than ever incapable of returning to the right."

"Novelty is never to be found in the commonplace, be it never so new."

"Some people are so impenetrably dull that no wit can reach their understanding—just as aquafortis itself can't bite through tallow."

"There is no simplicity so simple as that which is refined; no sorrow so touching as that which is subdued; no art so beautiful as that which is concealed."

Among the many notable persons of Miss Rigby's acquaintance may be mentioned the Carlyles. She thus sums up Mr. Carlyle's appearance:

"He is a kind of Burns—the head of a thinker, the eye of a lover, and the mouth of a peasant. His colours, too, seem to have been painted on his high cheek-bones at the plough's tail. He spoke broad Scotch, but his intonation was measured and musical, and his words came out sing-song, as if he were repeating them by heart. He talked of Popery, Luther, &c., quite in the 'Hero Worship' style; only we quarrelled about Luther, whom he defined as a 'nice man,' and I said he had nothing nice about him."

It was by the suggestion of Lockhart that she made literature, and not painting, the serious occupation of her life, although she says, "My pen has never been a favourite implement with me; the pencil is the child of my heart."

Her descriptions of scenery are admirably realistic. She doubts "whether what the world calls fine scenery ever looks well in a picture."

"What I like in Scotland is a broad hillside, with straggling bush or straying cattle—a warm brown-green, with patches of crimson heath, and above, clear and pure against the outline, a full white-bosomed cloud rolling about in a deep blue sky. And I love every inch of a burn, with ferns hanging over it, and every stone round which it ripples, rich in colour; or a yellow, gravelly bank, with nodding green bushes above, throwing their dancing shadows over it."

In the continental travels of Lady Eastlake and her husband, during which they visited all the principal Art Galleries in Europe, she had many opportunities for displaying her marvellous powers of observation, and rare transcripts of her impressions are to be found in the second volume of her Memoirs:

"Here we are in Italy, with all that God has created to be lovely, and man has made disgusting: the land of sapphire skies and opal lakes; of the vine, the fig-tree, the olive, the myrtle; of lies, cheating, and deceit; of filthy houses and hideous old women."

This portion of the book is illustrated by the admirable reproductions of sketches made at the time, with which the volumes are embellished.

During the tour Sir Charles Eastlake collected rare pictures, wherever he might light upon them, for himself as well as for the National Gallery. Upon one occasion, before they left London, an Italian had brought to their house in Fitzroy Square a "small and much injured, but exquisite, Fra Angelico—the rarest master almost in the world." The National Gallery would not have it, and Sir Charles resisted a strong temptation to buy it for himself, because the price was excessive. The picture was, moreover, so ruined as to make it doubtful how it would turn out in the hands of a restorer. In his dilemma Sir Charles frequently exclaimed: "If I could but first show it to Molteni!" Half the price was offered for the picture, but the Italian was obdurate, and left London without effecting a sale. The Molteni to whom Sir Charles had alluded was the secretary of the Academy of Milan, and a famous restorer of old pictures. I shall give the further adventures of the "Fra Angelico" in Lady Eastlake's own words:

"My husband tormented himself because he had lost it.

"At Culoz a bearded fellow came bowing to us; we both stared, and at length recollected the man with the Fra Angelico. The picture was in his trunk. Had Sir Charles received his letter? He had written to accept the offer. As he was going to Milan my husband made an appointment with him there, and thus unexpectedly picture, Molteni, and we were all brought together. Molteni, after inspecting it, said it was vera multa acria, but also one of the most beautiful, and that we might not meet with another pure Fra Angelico for three hundred years. The upshot is, that it is now in Molteni's custody, who promises to do his best, but says, 'Fra Angelico was an angel, I am but a man.'"

Thus, after all hope of possessing it had been abandoned, the treasure had been secured with all the romance of an Arabian tale! But, alas for the fickleness of fortune! Let us hear the end,—

"Our beautiful Fra Angelico ('The Last Judgment'), an exquisite gem by the rarest master in the world, has gone where so many treasures lie—to the bottom of the sea! It was coming in a steamer, the Black Prince, from Genoa to England. The vessel collided with another—how or why we don't know. . . . We try to be thankful that no one went down with it. The picture would have been the pride of our collection."

Lady Eastlake had her strong likes and dislikes, and, in common with all critics, frequently made wrong judgments. She venerated and adored Lookhart, and indeed justly. She says of Byron and of Scott, "Each could have engrossed a woman's heart; but the former it would have been the greatest misfortune in the world to have loved, the latter the greatest privilege." She disbelieved utterly in the teaching of Ruskin, considered Tolstoi simply unclean, and failed to appreciate the beauty and truth of Rossetti's art. She was undoubtedly the most nobly intellectual woman of her age. As she says of Scott, we may say of herself; "To have loved her would have been the greatest privilege!"

GEORGE NEWCOMEN.

Virgil in the Middle Ages. By Domenico Comparetti. Translated by E. F. M. Benecke; with an Introduction by Robinson Ellis. (Sonnenschein.)

Virgilius the Sorcerer. (David Nutt.)

THE translation before us will, we may hope, introduce to a wider public a book which established on its publication, some years ago, its right to be considered the standard authority on its subject. The story of the Virgil of the Middle Age is essentially Gothic. His figure stands before us strong and weak, respected and ridiculous, lovable and cruel, wily and curiously simple at the same time: the story full of those incongruities of detail which yet blend into a whole, as the work in a fine Gothic cathedral of all ages and styles unites into one harmonious building. Some idea of this story may be gathered from the compilation published by Mr. Nutt by readers who are not previously familiar with it. The problem set himself by our author is, How came this figure to be associated with the Virgil of classical antiquity? For this task Prof. Comparetti has every qualification but one; and it is almost inconceivable that new facts should be discovered, or a wider range of reading be brought to bear on it. Practically the whole literature of Europe from the fifth to the fifteenth century has been examined, and scarcely any important passage has been left unquoted, though the lines of Alanus in the "Anticlaudian":

"Virgili mense mendacia multa colorat Et facie veri contextit pallia falso," might have been used with advantage in the discussion in chapter xii. on the clerical conception of Virgil. To the problem stated above our author gives the following answer: Virgil at once imposed himself on Roman literature as the embodiment of the national sentiment in poetry, and as time went on he became the universal textbook in the schools. When Christianity forced its way to the surface of Roman life, certain passages of his works caused him to be represented as a prophet. In the early Middle Age another development caused his work to be regarded as a philosophical allegory; and to the men of those days he became the embodiment of all knowledge, present and future. On the other side his memory remained among the common people, and to him was attributed the possession of the only knowledge really worth having, the power over spirit and nature. The legend grew around him and came to the front early in the twelfth century at Naples. It rapidly spread into literature and romance, and during the thirteenth century took its final form. As learning spread over Europe, the legend died out, and the true Virgil once more resumed his place in men's imaginations.

It is to be regretted, however, that our author has approached his subject from the point of view of the humanist desirous to remove or explain away some blot on the popular conception of his hero, rather than that of a student regarding with impartial eyes all that is. The following extract will show the amount of sympathy to be expected in the treatment of the legend:

"The reader has perhaps already been wearied by the long succession of puerile stories which it has been necessary to tell, and I must make the more claim on his indulgence seeing that the series of them is by no means yet complete. But however tedious may appear the dissection of these phantastic trivialities, I trust that the prospect of being thereby enabled to explain a most singular phenomenon will induce him, as it has induced me, to persevere."

One may surely ask why, if our author found the subject so tedious, did he take it up at all? The truth is, that Italians are perhaps least of all men fitted to deal with Gothic art or literature. For example, Comparetti prides himself on the fact that the Italians took no part in the great medieval romantic movement: the genius of the nation was too "practical."

"One of the points in which the Italians, even in the Middle Ages, gave proof of their superiority to the other nations of Europe was the small share they took in the phantastic productions of that period. Romanticism, as far as that displayed itself in the composition of romances, is hardly represented in Italy, and in this, no less than in the matter of the chivalry which was one of romanticism's chief products, the position of Italy is, so to speak, a passive one; a certain infiltration of these ideas was inevitable, but the small number of such compositions to which Italian origin can be assigned shows clearly how little they were in sympathy with the active genius of the nation."

Quite so: and as a consequence the "active genius of the nation" found itself fully occupied in obeying other and more romantic peoples.

It would be difficult, too, to take a more superficial view of the Middle Age than that shown in the oft-quoted passage on the position of woman. It is summed up in the following paragraph:

"In spite, therefore, of certain ideals of chastity presented by the Christian hagiographies; in spite of the incense burnt at the altar of woman in romances, at tournaments, and in the Courts of Love [which never existed in reality] there never was a time in the world's history in which women were more grossly insulted, more shamefully reviled, or more basely defamed than they were in the Middle Ages by men of every class, beginning with the most serious writers of theology, and going down to the mountebanks of the street-plays."

An admirer of the Middle Age might retort that the Italians of the late Renaissance acquired considerable skill in the matter of base defamation of women; but without doing so, one may ask what period Prof. Comparetti has in his mind. Is it from the twelfth to the thirteenth century? or the time when modern Europe was rotting off the slough of Feudalism in the fifteenth century? The serious theologians did not exceed the virulence of St. Jerome, and as a matter of fact the earliest "street plays" we have give us tender and loving portraits of woman at her best. No doubt the fabliaux give us the other side of the picture; but their Eastern origin explains their treatment of women, and their mirthfulness their popularity. Our author's question, "What, we may ask, would become of the human race if every woman were either a St. Theresa or an Iseult?" is beside the mark. "What would become of the human race if every man were a Hamlet or a Don Quixote?" The obvious answer is that not one in ten million is capable of it, and that most of us would be the better for some inspiration of these ideals. The real difficulty in considering the position of woman in the Middle Age is to get to know anything about her, as she stands hidden behind the curtain of a conventional literature of praise or defamation.

In spite of all this Comparetti seems to have ploughed his way through the documents till he arrived at the true solution of the difficulties of the Virgil story; and, except in unimportant particulars, little can be added to his work. The Dolopathos Romance should have been quoted from the earliest form—the Latin published by Oesterley. The English translator should have checked his references—e.g., in one chapter P. Meyer's name is spelt in different ways, and a reference to the Decameron is given as viii. 4 instead of vii. 4. The serious objection to this translation is Mr. Benecke's habit of using colloquialisms every now and then. Take these examples from one page: "Phoeilla . . . heard so much about Virgil that she got to be in love with him as few women have ever been." "Virgil answered that, as for marrying, that was not in his line, but that otherwise he was at her disposal." "Virgil, however, . . . promptly told her to try that on someone else." This sort of writing is unworthy of a serious contribution to English literature, and Mr. Benecke will do well to remedy it in the second edition that we hope will be called for. At the same time we would call his attention to his unpardonable fault in not providing the book with an index—a fault which renders it practically without value to a scholar. Prof. Ellis's introduction will not have been useless if it leads him to make the acquaintance of some of the romances he condemns as "shocking, no less by the improbability than the incongruity of their incidents," when he may perhaps see cause to modify his opinion.

ROBERT STEELE.

With H.M. 9th Lancers during the Mutiny.
The Letters of Brevet-Major O. H. S. Anson. Edited by his Son, Harcourt S. Anson. (W. H. Allen.)

To some these letters will be full of interest; on many, we fear, they will fall flat. Few men saw more of the Mutiny than Major Anson; few letters tell us less. It would be unfair to expect of them too much. Though dated from fields on which India was being re-won, step by step, from Delhi to Lucknow, they scarcely get beyond the track of a squadron leader's daily round of duty: they were written for one who cared to hear, not how history was making, but how the writer fared. It is in this their value lies; for the Lancer was always to the front, and if he did not see far, he saw well. He brings home to us the days and nights of those weary, sickening months before Delhi: what the camp of besiegers, themselves besieged, was like; what it is to give and take no quarter. We laugh over the Rifleman complaining of new breastworks, that "before there was a chance of being hit in the body, now he could only be hit in the head"; or over the three brother-officers sitting without a tent, "like three disconsolate mermaids dripping with dew." We like to think of Anson, over 6 feet 2 inches in his socks, picking up playthings in the Palace for his children on the hills. But meanwhile,

"in the middle of the Chandnee Choke there were lying exposed, with only pyjamas on, the bodies of three of the king's sons, who were killed by Hodson's people. The centre one, a large, fat man, was the one who had imbrued his own hands in the blood of our people."

At Agra:

"I cannot tell you how completely the enemy surprised our camp." "Our advanced guard were caught unarm'd and in their shirtsleeves, eating their breakfast." "H., while bathing, had three round shots within three or four paces of him, and says he never put on his trousers faster." "The camp was now nearly pitched, and our artillery was at work in five minutes." "Directly the Pandies saw us bearing down at full speed on them, they one and all exclaimed, 'Wah, wah, Delhi ke ballam regiment,' and ran off faster than they came."

Anson himself led the charge.

"We pursued them to the Kalinaddee, about ten miles off, and took every gun (thirteen) that they had crossed, and from 300 to 400 hackeries."

Rarely have discipline and self-reliance been more rudely tried.

It is well to close our eyes over the ghastly relics of the charnel-house at Cawnpore. The scar still reddens at the touch.

"The very great work of relieving the garrison of Lucknow is so far complete . . . the labour of removing 428 women and children, besides some 1000 sick and wounded, has been immense, and attended with no little risk. We had not evacuated the Martinière fifteen minutes to-day [November 25] before it was swarming with Pandies like a nest of ants. The same with the Dilkoosha. . . . Poor General Havelock died about eleven o'clock yesterday, at the Dilkoosha, and we buried him here [the Alum Bagh] this morning. He died of an acute attack of dysentery, brought on, I verily believe, by running nearly three-quarters of a mile, under fire, from the Residency, to meet the Commander-in-Chief, and greet him as his deliverer."

Grim stories are told of the fight at Gosain-ganj and the taking of Fatehgarh; then back to Cawnpore; attacks on outlying villages, and on to the capture of Lucknow. Where work was to be done, the Lancers were there to do it. The tale is dreary, and we welcome a smile over "Sir Hope said so innocently of Lady Grant, 'She had, you know, no idea of ever being a lady.'" At times the Lancers indulged in ethics:

"There was such a lively discussion at mess last night about whether it was right or wrong to kill one's wife sooner than let her fall into the hands of the Sepoys. We came to the conclusion that it was wrong; but that if we happened to be jurymen in the case, we should let the delinquent off."

And so, from June 1, 1857, at Paniput, to the end of March, 1858, at Lucknow, where Anson, now worn out, obtained the leave he had so hardly earned.

He had the feelings of a man:

"You must expect to see me return," he wrote on his way down from Delhi, "without a heart or feelings of any soft, humanising tendency, if I am destined to witness, day after day, such harrowing scenes of revolting barbarity as have been perpetrated during the last two days, and are at the present moment enacting in this place."

If we would, we cannot leave unlifted a corner of the veil that should hide much that then went on; and it may do us good to know what an honest soldier felt:

"The only wonder to me in this land is that all do not at once rise upon us, and exterminate the hated Feringhees, who so grievously oppress them."

We get behind the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war, and are taught what a death grapple between alien races means. Let us hope that, in groping after justice for now wellnigh forty years, we have deserved the loyalty and devotion that shone out in our last campaign. The Roman poet sang: "Triumphatque possit Roma ferox dare jura Medis." As the annals of the Roman people teach,

"It is the condition of permanent dominion that the conquerors should absorb the conquered gradually into their own body, by extending, as circumstances arise, a share of their own exclusive privileges to the masses from whom they have torn their original independence."

India will then, and not till then, be ours, when "Civis Britannicus sum" has become the watch-word from Chitral to Cape Comorin.

Cora Linn. By J. G. Phillips. (Alexander Gardner.)

The Whaups of Durley. By William C. Fraser. (Fisher Unwin.)

The Days of Auld Lang Syne. By Ian Mac-laren. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

MR. CUSHING has achieved a very great, if also rather revolting, success in The Shepherdess of Treva; and the only fault that can be found with his book is that he has prolonged the agonies of his plot over three volumes instead of confining them to two. The first volume, to which Mr. Hardy would have given some such title as "The Man and the Woman," is almost perfect in its way. Nothing could be better than the entrance of Quartermass, the tempter—who is not quite a Don Juan, however—into the Mathey paradise in Treva: a paradise chastened for Bitha, the shepherdess, by the presence of a suspicious and jealous step-mother. The growth of love in Bitha's pure but unsophisticated heart is managed with skill. Quartermass, it is true, does not seem quite at home in his character of would-be seducer, and his placing of Bitha in what used to be known as "the gilded den of infamy" is rather too suggestive of the old Minerva Press school of fiction. Bitha's grief when, by the help of a friendly "soiled dove," she discovers the true character of her lover's intentions towards her, is admirably brought out, and her escape to the protection—though in no vulgar sense—of Oocomore, the artist and man of honour, is a thoroughly good bit of description. After this, however, the story flags. Bitha's successes as an artist, her securing of a good husband, the injury done to her reputation by rumours that she has been Quartermass's mistress, and the final vindication of her name at the pistol's mouth, were, of course, inevitable. It is passing the bounds of the pleasurable, if not also the credible, to give Bitha for husband the father of her lover, and to torture that worthy man for a whole volume with the appalling suspicion that he has married his son's discarded mistress. The closing chapter, with its clinical details, is too terrible. However, Mr. Cushing has set himself to produce a quite unparalleled tragedy, and he has succeeded; and his book is very well written.

Possibly The Horseman's Word is less notable as an actual performance in literature than as a sign of the times in connexion with Scottish fiction. It is an attempt to storm the Kailyard ascendancy of village domesticity with its pathos and humour, and to try to conjure with the superstitious and the uncanny. Into a Scotch farm there is introduced a strange, sulky, silent being, who has really no sympathetic or other links with his brother men, but who has, and shows from the first, a marvellous power over horses. After he is engaged as a "horseman" by the farmer, he is nicknamed "The Kelpy," and has rather a hard time of it with his fellow-servants. This curious man has had another history under the nickname of "The Ill-Fitter." His real name is John Merton; and, had he lived long enough, he might have become the Earl of Calziel. Essentially a monster, he is yet capable of love. A poor girl, Queanie, comes into his life. He marries her, and when she dies he has nothing left to live for. Altogether, the author of The Horseman's Word has all the elements of a successful romance of a very uncommon kind at his hand. He has not perfectly succeeded yet. Certainly his style is occasionally turgid, and he has to learn the art of working up a compact plot. Yet it is not too much to say that a new novelist has arisen, who, if he takes pains, will strike out a line for himself.

There is in The Yellow Wave far too much both of "tall" writing and of impossible incident, for the present superabundance of which we have, it is to be feared, to thank the success of The Battle of Dorking.

"Night had fallen, and the stars looked down on the silent waters—some fixed and cold, as though weary of their endless vigil over sin and shame, others twinkling and bright, as if for ever winking at man's impurities."

In this Corinthian style the book opens, and there is much of the same kind through its course; and yet the story is full of power of all sorts. There is a certain straining after theatrical effect in the quarrel over Heather Cameron between Philip Orloff, the passionate and unfortunate Russian who appears in the first chapter, and the hypnotising Mephistopheles Harden. But the killing of Harden is an effective incident. Then, although the Mongolian invasion of Australia is—at least, so it is to be hoped—an utter improbability, the bringing of it about through commercial trickery, diplomatic manoeuvring, and military skill managed with very great ability. Society in Australia is well drawn; and the labour disputes, which are represented as precipitating the politico-military crisis, are clearly—if, indeed, a trifle too clearly—defined. The fighting between the victorious Mongols, whose leader, Leroy, is, of course, Orloff under another name, and the patriotic Australians, in particular the irregulars led by the dauntless Dick Hatton, is as good as anything that Mr. Rider Haggard has ever done. The final tragedy, the death of Orloff and Heather Cameron, comes as a relief, and than this no better proof could be given of its success as a wind-up to a plot. Altogether, A Yellow Wave is the strongest novel of the decadence-of-England type that has yet been published.

Ouida never wrote a more compact or more repulsive story than Toxin, which, as the name virtually implies, is an attempt to show what power for evil a great scientific discovery may possess in the hands of a thoroughly unscrupulous man. Veronica Zaranegra, a Venetian beauty, loses her opal necklace. It is brought back to her by "a beautiful youth with starry eyes." This youth, Adrianis, falls in love with Veronica, and Veronica falls in love with him. They are very happy and would be very happy ever afterwards but for Damer, Adrianis's English medical friend. Damer, having killed his conscience, also kills Adrianis in the most scientific fashion when an opportunity is offered him of saving his friend's life. Ten months later Damer marries Veronica, who abhors him, but is magnetised by his will. Toxin is a ghastly story, well written, well printed, and very tastefully illustrated. But Damer's unscrupulousness is perhaps rather overdone.

There is undoubtedly a great deal of ingenuity in The Masquerade Mystery; but Mr. Fergus Hume has set himself too obviously to beat the record of previous mystery-mongers, and it must be added that his "Mr. Tait" is an amateurish

Sherlock Holmes. The question is at first who killed Claude Larcher's father. Various people, of course, might have had some reason for committing the crime. In particular, there are the mysterious Mrs. Bezel and the lawyer Francis Hilliston, whom Claude's friend Tait suspects. But, unfortunately, it turns out that it is not Larcher père who has been killed but another man altogether, Jeringham by name. Thereupon endless confusion follows; for it turns out that Mrs. Bezel is one Mona Bantry whom Hilliston ought to have married, and whom he makes his second wife after a final confession as to how his first—before she was his first—killed Jeringham in mistake for Hilliston, and because she saw him as she thought kissing Mrs. Larcher. But the confusion is too involved to be even credible. Were it not for one or two love affairs of a rather commonplace kind, The Masquerade Mystery would be very heavy reading.

It would be absurd to describe Mr. Gordon Phillips as the successor of Mr. Stevenson, or even to consider him as, to any serious extent, a rival to Mr. Crockett. But there is no reason whatever why he should not run Sir Thomas Dick Lauder and James Grant tolerably hard. In compactness of plot, and in other important respects, his new story is a great advance upon James Macpherson. He still gives us too much inflated and ineffective writing like:

"Peal followed peal, and the lightning wriggled and twisted like snakes in mid-air. The sea hissed and foamed and boiled around the tiny boat, while the occupants sat awestruck and allowed it to drift."

Sometimes a character, who is intended to be especially impressive, poses in a melodramatic fashion: as, for example, Morgar, the Chief of the Clyde, when, having killed Sir Stephen Hay, the leading traitor of the book, he dies after making a long speech. Mac Ian Rua, too, is all very well as the walking gentleman of the piece, the discoverer of all the conspiracies, and the lover of the Princess Cora; but as the mighty huntsman on the coal-black steed rushing to the help of King Malcolm when he is sorely pressed by the Norsemen at the battle of Mortlach, he is only a shade less histrionic than Morgar, whom he succeeds as Chief of the Clyde. At the same time, Mr. Phillips may be allowed to have made a living picture out of Scottish history in the days of Malcolm and Kentigern. He should be content, however, with fewer sensational incidents than he has crowded into this volume.

There is more to be said for the good intentions of the author of The Whaups of Durley than for his success as a story-teller. No doubt, with the help of Robbie Lindsay's "spy-glass," or the author's own literary equivalent, one may understand and admire Durley, and even admit that "nowhere can you find greener valleys, brighter-dancing streams, softer-swelling purple hills, sweeter clumps of hazel and rowan trees." But the characters in Durley, even Brose Jock, are too commonplace—not in position, but in intellectual grit—for full-length portraiture; and such chapters as "How we learned our Lessons" and "The Maister's Cuddy" are simply the dregs of the Kail-yard. Mr. Fraser improves when he relates the adventures of "The Dail's Bückie," who takes to poaching, falls in love with a girl very much above him in the social sense, and perseveres till he finally succeeds in marrying her when she is a widow. The return of the first and worthless husband almost in time to see his wife commit bigamy is a trifle too hackneyed. Altogether, The Whaups of Dursley must be considered one of the thinnest books that have had their origin in the new boom in Scottish fiction.

It would not at all surprise me were The Days of Auld Lang Syne to "catch on" less rapidly at first as did its predecessor, Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush. It does not possess the contagious pathos of that book; and perhaps the bloom is no longer on the Kail-yard. And yet, from the purely literary point of view, and in the all-important matter of style, the character-studies in it are superior to those other Drumtochty "views" which have given their author a place next to Mr. Barrie on Scotch shelves and in Scotch hearts. There is not more humour, perhaps, in the new book than there was in the old, but what there is is distinctly robust. Thus, there could hardly be anything better in its way than the sketch—at the beginning of The Days of Auld Lang Syne—of the devices by which Hillocks, one of Ian Maclaren's favourite farmers, prevents his rent from being raised. He has given us, too, in Posty—a tipping yet good-hearted and even shrewd village postman, who is capable of self-sacrifice to any extent when the pinch comes—an admirable example of the old liberty-loving Scot, who took occasionally to whisky because in and through it he gained an escape from his environment of penury and serfdom. Jamie Soutar, the cynic—even if he occasionally says rather too smart things—is superior to some of the saints that were associated with him in Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush. Drumsheugh remains the same as he was—and, well, I am not greatly in love with Drumsheugh. Besides Posty, we have delightful glimpses of a Dr. Davidson, a fine survival of the old Moderate school of Scotch clergy, generally urbane, but, when necessity arises, capable of losing his temper to good purpose, and even of taking a tyrant by the throat. It appears to me, however, that the author, who still chooses to be known as "Ian Maclaren," has now exhausted Drumtochty, and should try his hand at a regular novel, for which the humour and man-of-the-worldliness—I cannot find a better word—displayed in his second volume seem admirably to qualify him.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

SOME VOLUMES OF VERSE.

Poems of the Day and Year. By Frederick Tennyson. (John Lane.) Mr. Frederick Tennyson's Poems of the Day and Year is more markedly a collection of nature poems than any other which has been published during the last few years, putting anthologies out of the question. Disdaining to employ his powers in behalf of any of the current problems, content to watch buds open and to hear birds sing, Mr. Tennyson has no inclination to comment in verse upon the hardships of loafers and match-girls and criminals, as one of his younger brethren of the lyre is pleased to do. Mr. Tennyson does not sing of, but for, men and women. If in the course of this book he presents any opinion whatever, it is that more of heaven upon earth is to be discovered under the clear country skies than in the thicker atmosphere of a great town. It is easy to see that the poet has no jot of sympathy with such people as keep at heart a desire to add "golden numbers to golden numbers" of pounds, even though they already possess a sufficiency of wealth to admit of their retirement from commerce, and of their approach to peace in some quiet haunt of flowers and finches. By thus ignoring the march of events, and by concealing his views, Mr. Tennyson naturally runs the risk of having but a small assembly of friends. Those who hunger after poetry which does not merely pick out the pleasant for treatment will not wish to make a long stay with Mr. Tennyson; those whose minds are set upon poems of the open air will take the best of this singer's music very close to their hearts, satisfied by the subjects as well as by the fluency and felicity of their treatment. Among the forty-four poems in this volume there are quite a dozen fit to command the affection of readers, and to their making Mr. Tennyson has applied qualities of a high order. We intend to quote the first four stanzas of "The Skylark and the Post." Shelley and Hogg, to say nothing of Wordsworth, have made it dangerous for less lofty singers to address the lark. It goes without saying that Mr. Tennyson falls short of the success of the immortals; but, in our opinion, his attempt is more valuable than that of any poet who has undertaken a similar task in the last five years.

"How the blithe lark runs up the golden stair
That leans thro' cloudy gates from heaven to earth,
And all alone in the empyreal air
Fills it with jubilant sweet songs of mirth!
How far he seems, how far
With the light upon his wings!
Is it a bird, or star
That shines and sings?"

"What matter if the days be dark and frore?
That sunbeam tells of other days to be;
And singing in the light that floods him o'er
In joy he overtakes futurity:
Under cloud arches vast
He peeps, and sees behind Great summer coming fast
Adown the wind.

"And now he dives into a rainbow's rivers;
In streams of gold and purple he is drown'd;
Shrilly the arrows of his song he shivers,
As tho' the stormy drops were turned to sound;
And now he issues thro',
He scales a cloudy tower;
Faintly, like falling dew,
His fast notes shower.

"Let every wind be hushed, that I may hear
The wondrous things he tells the earth below;
Things that we dream of he is watching near,
Hopes that we never dreamed he would bestow:
Alas! the storm hath rolled Back the gold gates again,
Or surely he had told
All heaven to men!"

All lovers of poetry pure and simple will have no difficulty in discovering beauties among the songs which Mr. Tennyson has, for our pleasure, printed.

Poems. By Jennings Carmichael (Mrs. Francis Mullis). (Longmans.) We learn from Mr. J. F. Hogan's preface that Miss Jennings Carmichael's childhood was passed among the forests of Eastern Victoria. Her first poems were composed in the solitudes of the bush, where she had unrivalled opportunities for seeing the luxuriance and for feeling the impressiveness of Nature. It is not to be wondered at that the memory of such surroundings can never fade. Although the poetess no longer inhabits the home of her early years, she, in poem after poem, shows how strong an effect the sights and sounds of wild regions made upon her impressionable mind. While applauding the kindness of heart which has stimulated Mr. Hogan to write his introduction to the book now before us, we cannot help giving point to our conviction that he has allowed his enthusiasm to run riot, and thus to out-distance plodding criticism. To speak frankly, we find far more numerous occasions for blame than for praise in Miss Carmichael's volume, though we are not blind to the presence of such qualities in her work as prove that the root of the matter is in her. One thing is quite certain. Till she puts a strong restraint upon her passion for dressing wellnigh every subject under the sun in rhyme, she cannot arrive at that point of success which her merits indicate as a possible goal. Miss Carmichael is often unftttingly voluble. That facility, which her every page proves, sets a trap for her reputation, and we must admit that she falls into it with distressing frequency. A cunning and a valorous revision, had it been exercised upon these examples of the prodigal pipe, might have resulted in a volume of charm. As it is, we are bewildered by fluting the bad and the good in friendly company; the significant and the insignificant elbowing one another for pride of place. In a word, the authoress destroys too little, and is too easily content with what survives the flame. It would be an unpleasant act to set down here examples of what we most dislike in Poems. To bring forward a sign of Miss Carmichael's better powers will be a display of tolerance which may cause the person most concerned in these remarks to feel convinced that ours are sincere strictures:

"Brave leaf-stript branches! Do I guess aright—
And does your spirit sing
Of all the buds that tarry for the light, Waiting the unborn Spring?
Are ye full conscious of the wealthy store
Soon thro' the bark to press,
And robe you, as in young-eyed Springs of yore,
In garb of loveliness?"

"Well may ye bear the season's pause, and take Deep draughts of sunlight good:
The little buds, too, softly, slowly wake,
Sleeping within the wood.
Well may ye rest with patient strength tho' bare
And spectral as a wraith!
Nature with you, in ever-present care,
Has never broken faith.

"You know, wise trees! 'tis sometimes best to cast
The old robes quite away;
The vesture, beauteous and new, grows fast,
And will be worn one day.
So steadfast stand: a lesson great I see
In your appointed fate—
God has another garb of faith for me,
If I will trust and wait."

At one period of her career Miss Carmichael was engaged in the good work of nursing in a children's hospital; and not a few of her poems bear references to this occupation.

Sonnets and Songs. By May Bateman. (Elkin Mathews.) Miss May Bateman's slight little, light little book opens with a note of gravity, which by no means prepares a reader for a shower of rondeaus, villanelles, roundels, triolets, and rondelets; for in such French trickeries the writer of Sonnets and Songs takes considerable pleasure. The first course is a sequence of sonnets, the main idea of which is a duet of love between a lady and a gentleman. It is enough to say that all of the fourteen-lined sections are evidences of Miss Bateman's skill, while a few of them make a worthy appeal as eloquent utterances. Passing on, we are in the thick of pretty trifles, some of which are winning enough, while some are so weak that the inevitable result is a feeling of regret to discover the aim grown into such an unimportant end. We cannot help thinking that Miss Bateman is meant for different work in rhyme, a conclusion which we are driven to adopt by a recollection of the multitudes of rondeaus and their relations added to English verse in the last fifteen years. Below will be found a sample of Miss Bateman's work:

"AN APPRECIATION.

"A woman's room. Its daintiness
Proclaims it Here. Each quaint recess
Fragrant with flowers; each cosy seat
Subtle with invitation meet
A man's requirements, more or less.

"It soothes one like a faint caress,
A Lover's sympathy—confess
You have not ever seen so sweet
A woman's room?"

"Her books and pictures—all express Her varied moods. Ah, how I bless
The day that brought her little feet
More near—since, to be quite complete,
It needs the rustle of Her dress—
A woman's room!"

There are so many signs of ability scattered among the pages of Sonnets and Songs that we hope the authoress will cease to cramp her muse, and will henceforth progress toward more valuable results.

Verses. By J. A. Nicklin. (David Nutt.) More to be congratulated than either of the two ladies whose verses we are fresh from noticing is Mr. J. A. Nicklin. For while Miss Carmichael dashes off stanza after stanza, passing the inadequate without a moment of hesitation, Mr. Nicklin evidently searches long for the inevitable expression of his idea, only content when he has discovered the suitable metre and the just epithet. While Miss Bateman labours to produce such literary trinkets as villanelles and triolets, which are untrue to their nature if they are condemned to carry a too serious meaning, the author of Verses does not spare himself in the exercise of thinking deeply. It is true that in his compositions there are traces of extreme care, the exhibition of which prevents us from enjoying such feelings as invade us when we read the verses of a more spontaneous poet; but plenty of midnight oil and a file of the sharpest are excellent possessions for young rhymers. The more these are used the surer is the eventual arrival of an excellent facility. Signs, too, are not wanted that Mr. Nicklin is as yet without a method of his own: either he has founded his style upon that of the author of "The Song of the Sword," or one more example of what is called unconscious plagiarism has to be recorded. So far we have been granting praise to Mr. Nicklin in rather a roundabout manner. It is now time to show, by means of quotation, that virtue—using the word as it is employed in a famous verse in one of the Gospels—has proceeded from him. The following poem, though it belongs more to perfect description than to real poetry, is a good example of the promising matter contained in this small volume:

"I AM SO SHAKEN BY THESE FEVERS WHITE."

"I think the sodden asphalt of the street,
That knows so well the tramp-tramp of my feet,
Begins to wonder with a dull surmise
In its brute soul, where trod and crushed it lies,
'What is it that he lingers here to meet?'

"I think the yellow lamps that flicker there
So ghostly wan through the damp-choking air, Must ask themselves, 'What makes he here,
and why,
Where shadows lurk the deepest, should he pry
And peer and start, with such a bloodshot stare?'

"I think the very houses weary grow
To hear my heavy footfall dragging slow,
And through the night must whisper in the dark,
'How chill the sleet! . . . Art waking, brother? . . . Hark!
God send the dawn, that he may homeward go!'

"In the arched blackness, at the River's side,
I bend to watch it lean a swollen tide
One moment on the bridge's pier, and then
Crash down a little cataract again,
And, humming, onward sweep, unchecked and wide.

"The station-lights make patines on the flood
Of gold and amber; inwards, foam-bells stud
Back-water and eddy, and the dripping bank.
And blowing up the channel, salt and dank,
The night-wind cools the fever in the blood."

One word more. Mr. Nicklin occasionally accomplishes work which is nothing but a species of literary photography. In this respect he must be on his guard. In the management of his metres and in the choice of words he leaves little to be desired. Verses is a book deserving of salvation from the ruin which overtakes nine out of every ten volumes of modern song.

NORMAN GALE.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. make a welcome announcement—that they have in the press a new book by Mr. W. E. H. Lecky, in two volumes, to be entitled Democracy and Liberty.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have arranged to issue in their "Eversley" series a complete edition of the Works of William and Dorothy Wordsworth, edited by Prof. W. Knight. It will consist altogether of sixteen volumes, of which the poems will form eight, the prose and the journals three each, and the life two. Each volume will have an etched portrait and a vignette by M. H. Manesse.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co.'s new edition of the novels of Marryat, which has been in active preparation since last summer, under the editorship of Mr. R. Brimley Johnson, will be published in the early spring. It will be printed from the text of the earliest editions, and every care is being taken to prevent the many errors that have disfigured modern cheap reprints. The illustrations will be in the form of etchings on copper, which have been drawn and etched specially for this edition.

MR. J. FITZGERALD MOLLOY has written a new biography of the Countess of Blessington, which will shortly be published by Messrs. Downey & Co. under the title of The Most Gorgeous Lady Blessington, the name given to her by Dr. Parr and familiarly used by her intimates. Apart from other original sources, the author has been permitted to make use of the six MS. volumes in the possession of Mr. Morrison, containing the correspondence written by the Countess, or addressed to her by the leading men and women of the day in literature, society, and art. From this source will be published for the first time letters of Byron, Landor, Disraeli, Lytton, Barry Cornwall, Marryat, Macready, and Charles Dickens, many of which throw light on their own works. The book will be in two volumes, illustrated with a photogravure portrait.

MESSRS. DAVID BRYCE & SON, of Glasgow, propose to issue on January 25—the centenary of the poet's death—a "ready reference" edition of the poetical works of Robert Burns. The peculiarity of this edition is that the index will give both titles and first lines in a single alphabet. There will be a brief memoir and a glossary, and also twenty-four photogravures of pictures by Nasmyth, Harvey, Paed, Erskine Nicol, Archer, &c.

In view of the political crisis, Mr. John Murray proposes to issue next week, in a cheap form, a reprint of that portion of Mr. John Martineau's Life of Sir Bartle Frere which deals with South African affairs.

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER & Co. will publish towards the end of this month a new work by Sir William Muir, entitled The Mamelukes or Slave Dynasty of Egypt. The volume contains a survey of the Mameluke dynasty, which began under Beibars, A.D. 1260, and was brought to a close by the Ottoman Sultan Selim in A.D. 1517. It also completes the history of the Abbasside Caliphate, down to the assumption of the title by the Osmanly Sultanate. It will be illustrated with a map and twelve full-page plates.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co. will shortly issue in this country some 200 copies of the new Riverside edition of the works of Mr. John Burroughs. The series, which will be sold in sets only, will consist of nine volumes, as follows: Wake Robin, Winter Sunshine, Locusts and Will Honey, Indoor Studies, Fresh Fields, Birds and Poets, Riverby, Peppercorn, Signs and Seasons. Several portraits of the author and etched title-pages will accompany the volumes, which have been printed from new type on paper made expressly for the edition.

MR. ANTHONY HOPE's new book, entitled Comedies of Courtship, will be published early next week by Messrs. A. D. Innes & Co.

MESSRS. JARROLD & SONS will issue in a few days a new volume in their "Unknown Authors Series," entitled Brenda's Experiment, by Surgeon-Major H. M. Greenhow. The scene of the novel is laid in India, and the experiment is that of a "mixed marriage."

A CHEAP edition of Mr. Sala's autobiography will be issued by Messrs. Cassell & Co. in a few days. Three editions were rapidly called for of this work in its library form.

MESSRS. WELLS, GARDNER, DARTON & Co. will shortly issue a book by the Rev. the Hon. James Adderley, entitled Looking Upward. It is a collection of papers introductory to the study of the social question from a religious point of view.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK promises for immediate publication a volume of essays on social subjects, entitled Plain Talks on Plain Subjects, by Mr. Frederick A. Rees.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS announce a popular reprint of The Rights of Man and The Age of Reason, taken from Mr. Moncure Conway's complete edition of the works of Thomas Paine.

MR. ALLENSON will add to his series of "Tracts for the Times" the following: Am I fit to take the Lord's Supper? by the Rev. Samuel Pearson, of Manchester; and The Sobriety of Hope, by the Rev. C. Silvester Horne, of Kensington.

MR. KARL BLIND will have an article in the forthcoming number of the North American Review, entitled "The Crisis in the East," dealing mainly with the aspirations of the Young Turkish party.

THE annual meeting of the Folklore Society will be held at 22, Albemarle-street on Tuesday next, at 8 p.m., when Mr. Edward Clodd, who continues in the presidential chair for another year, will deliver an address.

THE Rev. Dr. William Barry will deliver a lecture on "Jonathan Swift" to the members of the Irish Literary Society in the rooms of the Society of Arts on Thursday next, at 8 p.m. A vote of thanks to the lecturer will be moved by Mr. Justin McCarthy, and seconded by Mr. J. Churton Collins.

THE Hungarians are just now very busy collecting memorials of their past history for the great exhibition of 1896, to commemorate the millennium of their occupation of Hungary. To this the Sultan, it appears, will be the chief contributor, his ancestors having had exceptionally favourable opportunities for collecting Hungarian curios. But there are plenty of contributions from other quarters. We read in a Hungarian paper that the Marquis of Bath has sent from Longleat a very interesting relic, in the form of portraits by a contemporary artist of Tü-köly Imre and his wife Zrinyi Ilona, the stepfather and mother of the celebrated Prince Francis Rakoczy II.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

FULL term began at Cambridge on Tuesday of the present week. At Oxford, residence will not be resumed until the end of next week.

A GENERAL meeting of Convocation of the University of London will be held on Thursday next, to consider the reports of the annual and special committees on the proposed reconstitution of the university.

THE syndics of the Cambridge University Press announce that the Collected Mathematical Papers of the late Prof. Cayley will probably occupy thirteen volumes, instead of the ten volumes originally contemplated.

THE managers of the Hort Memorial Fund will meet on Tuesday, February 18, for the purpose of considering applications for grants. The regulations may be seen in the Cambridge University Calendar (p. 488 f.). The names of applicants, with a statement of the work which they propose to undertake, must be sent to the Regius Professor of Divinity, Divinity School, Cambridge, not later than Saturday, February 8.

DR. SANDYS, the public orator, gave two open lectures this week, at St. John's College, on "The History of Classical Learning in England to the Death of Bentley, in 1742."

MR. R. D. HOLT has presented to University College, Liverpool, a bronze replica of the marble bust of the late Earl of Derby, past president of the college, executed by Mr. Thomas Brock, which will be placed in the entrance hall of Victoria-buildings. Dr. Ricketts, of Birkenhead, has also presented to the college his valuable collection of mineral and geological specimens.

PROF. ALTHAUS will deliver a course of four lectures, in German, on "German Literature" at University College, on Thursdays, at 8.30 p.m., beginning on January 23; and Prof. Allemand will deliver a course of five lectures, in French, on "French Literature," on Fridays, beginning on January 24. Both these courses are open to the public free.

PROF. G. C. WARR will give a course of eight lectures on "The Tragedies of Aeschylus," at 13, Kensington-square, the Ladies' Department of King's College—on Wednesdays at 3 p.m., beginning on January 29.

AT the London Institution, on Monday next, Mr. E. J. C. Morton will deliver a lecture on "Cambridge University, its History and Development."

THE Council of Legal Education have arranged for a course of six lectures on "The Duties and Liabilities of Trustees," by Mr. Augustine Birrell, to be delivered in the lecture room under the Inner Temple Library, on Thursdays, at 7.30 p.m., beginning this week.

WE have received the fifth issue of Minerva, the Jahrbuch der Gelehrten Welt, edited by Dr. R. Kekula of Berlin and Karl Trübner of Strassburg. The first issue, in 1891, contained only 359 pages. It has now increased to no less than 989 pages; and yet it is necessary to refer, for historical details, to earlier numbers. For frontispiece, it is illustrated with a portrait of Schiaparelli, the Italian astronomer, thus worthily maintaining its cosmopolitan character, though the reproduction falls far below the former standard. We again make bold to urge the claims of Mendeleef for next year. Among many minor improvements, we notice that, in the statistics, a distinction is now rightly drawn between the students who attend universities or colleges, and those who only enter as candidates for examination. The numerical order of the first eight European universities is—Berlin, Vienna, Madrid, Naples, Moscow, Budapest, Munich, and Athens. It appears that Harvard surpasses Oxford; but it is absurd to put Manchester above Edinburgh.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

ON READING THE LETTERS OF MATTHEW ARNOLD.

Was it not well you should no longer stay,
Seeing we know you better than before!
You whose true heart was tender to the core
And clear as those pellucid brooks that stray Hid in the Chiltern grasses. Not a spray
Of bright may-blossom or of diamond frore
But wove its rainbows for you; from the shore
To Fairfield's crown you honoured Nature's way.
Breathed from those letters, like the south wind,
Come
Sweet thoughts for others, purpose high and pure,
Hope inexhaustible and holy will
To help the nation, patience to endure,
A love of all that keeps us England still Filled with the dear felicities of home.

H. D. RAWNSLEY.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THOUGH Mr. Aubrey Beardale contributes several clever illustrations, the new quarterly, called The Savoy, is anything but a repetition of an old enterprise. In form and character the serial which issues from the house of Mr. Leonard Smithers is as novel as it can be. As to its "get up," it has a large page, yet is delightfully light in the hand. It is not thick; very little of the writing in it has the fault of diffuseness, which belongs generally to bulk; and while some of its contents are chiefly entertaining, others are of a not less worthy gravity. From a writer of the distinction of Mr. Arthur Symonds we had good reason to expect refined and careful editing, nor are we disappointed of it. The commonplaces of literary pessimism and the easy ingenuities of an unsavoury subject (upon which reputations of a moment have been built, as upon sand) are alike absent from The Savoy. There is here some vivid, highly wrought prose and a good share of excellent verse, among which, at the present time, nothing will attract more attention than the editor's own charmingly flexible translation of a poem from the Fêtes Galantes of Paul Verlaine. Strange enough in theme, but with imagination really fired, are Mr. Ernest Dowson's verses, "Impenitentia Ultima"; and they flow along admirably. In criticism, an article on Emile Zola has the force and trenchantness which Mr. Havelock Ellis displays when at his best; and in "Criticism and the Critic" Mr. Selwyn Image is, of course, both urbane and ingenious. "Under the Hill" is a little too fantastic for us, nor does the article on "A Good Prince" appear a very notable performance, though touched with fancy. A tale by Mr. Dirks has healthy realism, which means, too, that it has a sound moral. Conspicuous places are assigned to Mr. Bernard Shaw and Mr. Frederick Wedmore. Mr. Shaw, in "Going to Church," is both grave and gay and full of stimulating thought; while Mr. Wedmore, in his tale, "To Nancy," studies a little dancing-girl, whose shoes "rush, comet-like, so far above her head," whose "gay blood passed into the place, electrical, overpowering," but who in private life is "a sedate young thing, in dull black frock; with limpid look in her serene eyes, steadily grey."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SIN-EATER IN WALES.

London: Jan. 11, 1896.

MR. Sidney Hartland's doubt as to what "school of thought" I follow may, at any rate, be taken as an indication that I have not thrust my own prejudices and prepossessions into this controversy. That I have "talked round" the subject is a charge that I willingly acknowledge to be true. After reading the previous discussions of the question (including Mr. Elton's remarks in his Origins of English History)—discussions which seemed to me to bring the matter to no satisfactory conclusion, I thought that a few sidelights might probably be an improvement. I am quite satisfied with the results obtained so far. I trust that I shall not appear immodest if I avow my belief that the controversy is no longer where it was when Mr. Hartland's letter appeared in the Times some few months ago. That gentleman has now denied and conceded quite as much as could fairly be expected of an author who was entirely absorbed in "strengthening" a very untenable theory. But really he is somewhat exacting. After I had presented him with cupan y meirw, diodlys, Robert Jones, Owen Pughe, and Sion Holi the beggarman, he is still waiting "until I have something better to offer." Well, I will not treat him as the workhouse authorities treated Oliver Twist, but will meekly comply with his request.

In one of the volumes of Miscellanies edited by Canon Raine for the Chetham Society is to be found an account of "The State, Civil and Ecclesiastical, of the County of Lancaster, about the year 1590," part of which is as follows:

"XV. Manifolde popishe Superstitions used in the Buriall of the dead.

"1. Som use the popishe Rites of Buriall towardes the dead Corps at home, as it wer burying it, befor it com to the Church.

"2. After that they sett forthe the Corps in thaire houses all garnished with Cresses, and sett rownde aboute with Tapers and Candelles burninge night and day till it be carried to the Church. All whiche time y<sup>e</sup> neighbors use to visit the Corps, and there everie one to saye (a Pater noster, or De profundis) for the Soule: the Belles (all the while) beinge ronge many a solemn Peale. After which, they are made partakers of the ded manse dowle or Banquet of Charitie.

"3. Thus all things being accomplished in right Popish order at home, at length they carle the Corse towards the Church all garnished with Croces, which they sett downe by the way at everie Crosse, and there all of them devoutly on their knees make prayers for the dead.

"4. And when in this superstitious sorte they have brought the Corse to the Churoche, som with hast prevent the minister, and burie the Corse them selves, because they will not be partakers of the service saide at the Buriall; som, overtreate the minister to omitt the Service, and som times obtayne theire purpose; and when the minister is redie to accomplishe the order of Service appointed for the Buriall, many of these that com with the Corpes will departe; for, Recusantes refuse not to bring it to y<sup>e</sup> Church, though they will not partake of the Service of the Churoche.

"5. Then, concerning those that remain with the Corse till it be buried, when they have sett downe the Corse in the Church, they bende themselves to theire privat prayer with Crosseinge and knockinge themselves. All kneelinge rownde the Corse neglectinge the publique Service then in hand. And, when the Corse is redie to be putt into the grave; som, by kissinge the ded Corpes; other, by wallinge the dead with more than Heathenlike owtries; other, with open invocations for the dead; and another sorte with Jangling the Belles, so disturb the whole action, that the minister is ofte compelled to lett passe that parte of Service appointed for the Buriall of the dead, and to withdrawe him selfe from their tumultuouse Assembly.

"6. After which Buriall, at theire Banquet in the Alehouse they often times have a 'Pater noster' for the dead.

"7. All the day and night they use to have excessive ringinge for y<sup>e</sup> dead, as also at the twelve monethes day after, which they call a minninge day. All which time of Ringinge, there use is to have theire privat devotions at home for the soule of the dead."

Quid plura? It would be insulting the intelligence and abusing the patience of the readers of the ACADEMY to lay before them any more evidence of that kind.

Dogmatism as to the diddle having "nothing to do" with the chul coffa is surely somewhat premature. Has Mr. Hartland read what Bingley, our earliest authority for the term so far, says about it?

I have not yet dealt with "M. Jorevin, apparently a Frenchman travelling in England." The writer in question was a M. Jorevin de Rocheford, whose travels were published at Paris in 1672 in three duodecimo volumes. The book does not seem to be at the British Museum; but the part dealing with the British Isles was translated and given in full in Astle's Antiquarian Repertory, iv., pp. 549-631 (1809). From that translation Owen and Blakeway in their History of Shrewsbury extracted the portion having reference to that town. Mr. Hartland has quoted as a complete sentence what is a mere fragment of one, and has "shorn off" the really "significant" portion. Here follows the complete sentence as printed in the Antiquarian Repertory. I have italicised the part omitted by Mr. Hartland:

"It is to be remarked that during this oration there stood upon the coffin a large pot of wine, out of which every one drank to the health of the deceased, hoping that he might surmount the difficulties he had to encounter in his road to Paradise, where by the mercy of God he was about to enter; on which mercy they founded all their hope, without considering their evil life, their wicked religion, and that God is just."

M. de Rocheford's meaning is now plain. He scornfully ridicules the employment by heretics of a rite which had no significance except for those who believed in purgatory and the efficacy of prayers for the dead. Really the portentous gravity with which poor Bagford is dragged in here, and the solemn reference to "an upper stratum of society" are very diverting. I hope that kind of thing is not the prevalent mode among "scientific students of custom."

One word in conclusion in reference to Strabo and Irish cannibalism. Mr. Hartland says (ACADEMY, November 23) that Strabo expressly ascribes to the Irish the custom of eating their dead parents. That statement is wrong, but it is not likely to mislead the readers of the ACADEMY. It is made in a far more misleading manner in the Legend of Perseus (ii., p. 281). There it is said that Strabo "admits fairly enough that his authority for the statement is not decisive." What Strabo expressly says is, that his authority for certain specified customs, including the one mentioned above, is not trustworthy. He implies that, as regards cannibalism, he is inclined to believe the tale. But on what grounds? Because, for one thing, it is said to be a Scythian custom also, and because many other nations are said to have practised it amid the rigours of a siege. If Mr. Hartland had consulted the original Greek he could not possibly have so mistaken his author's meaning, for the paragraph is very plain and easy. I am therefore driven to suspect that he has depended on a translation; but an unscholarly translator from Greek is very apt to neglect the force of particles, and (above all) of participial clauses. In fact,

"A participle by the story's brim
A simple participle is to him,
And it is nothing more!"

J. P. OWEN.

SHAKSPERE OR THEOBALD?

Kottingham: Dec. 2, 1895.

"His Nose was as sharpe as a Pen and [read on] a Table of greene fields [dale s]."—Henry V. II. iii.

Mr. Henry Bradley, writing in the ACADEMY of April 21, 1894, showed that in the Liber Niger Domus Edm. IV., dated A.D. 1470, "at the grene feald of the countynghouse," and "at the grene cloth," appear as equivalent expressions in reference to payments made (apparently) to the Children of the King's Chapel, and accounts rendered to the Steward, Treasurer, Controller, "or the Judges under them." In the time of Shakspeare, payments were made to the Children of the Chapel Royal for plays performed by them, which seem to have brought them into rivalry with the professional players. Presumably, when the latter performed before the Court, they received their reward under similar circumstances; and the appearance of the "green field of the counting-house," we may hope, was familiar to Shakspeare and his fellows.

Now turn to a scene of the nineteenth century (Fifty Years, by the Rev. Harry Jones):

"I gladly availed myself of his invitation and waited upon the Commissioners at Whitehall, where they sat at a long green table furnished with clean blotting-paper and new pens."

What struck the eye of Prebendary Jones struck that of Shakspeare in the days of Queen Elizabeth. One can fancy the actors waiting for the arrival of their paymaster, and catch a whisper of the jests, not always impersonal, which helped to pass the time. "I say, Shakspeare, that's like your nose," cries the clown of the party. The remark is taken good-humouredly (who would not be in good-humour on such an occasion?), its quaintness strikes the fancy of the dramatist, and crosses his mind when, pen in hand, he describes, by the mouth of Mrs. Quickly, the death of Falstaff.

But what is the meaning of the word "field" in this connexion? Comparing the definitions of Ducange (Niort, 1883): "(1) CAMPUS, Bellum, praelium," and "(3) Duellum ipsum, quod in campo sen arena initur," the French "CHAMP-CLOS, et, absolt, CHAMP, lieu fermé de barrières, où avaient lieu les duels judiciaires, les tournois," and perhaps the historical expression, "The Field of the Cloth of Gold," with the language of the Dialogus de Scaccario:

"scaccarii lusillis similem habet formam . . . Sic enim in scaccario lusilli quidam ordines sunt pugnatorum . . . sic in hęc . . . Item sicut in lusilli, pugna committitur inter reges: sic in hoc inter duos principaliter conflictus est . . . residentibus aliis tanquam iudicibus," &c.—(I. i.).

I was inclined to think that the term "field" had been transferred from the field of battle to the chessboard, thence to the exchequer-table, and finally to the "green field of the counting-house." But of this there is no direct evidence, and Ducange supplies a simpler explanation:

"8. CAMPUS, in scutis gentilitis, Gall. Champ; in pannis vero Fond, ut cum dicimus Etage à fond d'argent, à fond d'or, Pannus argenteus aureusve figuris distinctus apud Rymer, tom. 7, p. 577: Unum lectum de panno aureo de rubeo Campo cum foliis operatis in quodam frecto albo, &c., q. v.

Also s.v. frecta "Visitatio Thesaur. S. Pauli Londonens. ann. 1295 ['in Monastio Angl. tom. 3.]. The reference is to the original edition of 1673] Pag. 326: Unus pannus de viridi campo, cum rosulis inter Frecturas." The page cited is full of similar expressions.

"A cloth of green field" is, then, a cloth with a green ground, or composed of a green material. Everyone knows that constantly recurring motive of mediæval art and literature, a green field diversified with springing flowers. But it is time to conclude this "babble of green fields."

A SENTENCE IN MILTON'S PROSE.

London: Jan. 11, 1896.

In the passage extracted by Mr. Johnson, Lander thinks that he has quoted Milton's metrical sentence before. The earlier instance is worth mentioning, as it goes to illustrate Lander's fine superiority to our modern anxiety to "verify our references," which he shared, of course, with Scott and Lamb. It is in the article on "Catullus," contributed to the Foreign Quarterly Review in July, 1842, and reprinted in vol. x. of Messrs. Dent's edition of Lander:

"It is not necessary to turn to the grander poetry of Milton for verses more harmonious than those adduced [by Hallam]; we find them even in the midst of his prose. . . .

"When God commands to take the trumpet
And blow a shriller and a louder blast,
It rests not in Man's will what he shall do,
Or what he shall forbear."

"This sentence in the Treatise on Prelacy is printed in prose: it sounds like inspiration."

It is not quite what Milton wrote; but that never troubled Lander.

ARCHBISHOP USSHER IN OXFORD.

Athenæum Club, Dublin: Jan. 15, 1896.

In reply to the letter of Mr. Thomas on the above subject, let me say that Dr. Parr, in his Life, is very clear on the point. He says (p. 44), under date 1640, Usher "went to Oxford . . . to pursue his studies in the libraries there, where he was accommodated with lodgings in Christ Church by Dr. Morice, Canon of that House, and Hebrew Professor."

It is not likely, under these circumstances, that his name would be on the books. He was only a visitor for literary purposes, and we know did not remain there long.

SCIENCE.

SOME BOOKS ON CHEMISTRY.

Milk, its Nature and Composition. By C. M. Aikman, M.A., D.Sc. (A. & C. Black.) Into a compact, well-ordered volume Dr. Aikman has condensed an adequate and careful account of the chemistry and bacteriology of milk and its products. The practical operations of the dairy are alluded to only incidentally, the object of the author being to state and explain the scientific principles that underlie the several processes to which milk is subjected. To give an adequate notion of the scope of this useful handbook one ought to cite the complete table of contents. It must here suffice to state that the first sixty pages are devoted to an account of the formation, constituents, and changes of milk; the bacteria of milk are then discussed in a chapter of fifty pages; while a nearly equal space is assigned to butter and its bacteria, rennet, and cheese. The two final chapters are concerned with the testing of milk and with milk as a food. The volume as a whole should prove a valuable aid to students of the modern and improved system of dairying. In some details it admits of revision. We trust that the author, in preparing a second edition for the press, will pay special attention to the final chapter on "Milk as a Food." Here several alterations are needed. The term "nutrients," employed by the writer of this notice more than twenty years ago, is legitimate; but why should the compounds so named be tautologically described as "food nutrients"? Again, it is quite wrong to include amides and "nitrogenous extractives" in the proteine group. When Dr. Aikman tells us that oysters "are practically of the same nutritive value as milk" (p. 172), we feel that he cannot have had access to an accurate analysis of the edible portion of these mollusks. We think that the dynamic value of pure fats as food ought not to be reckoned so high as two and a half times that of an equal weight of starch or albumin (p. 167). There is a strange slip on p. 30, where the reader is informed that "albumin differs from casein in not containing phosphorus, and from the other albuminoids of milk in containing sulphur." How can this be, when Dr. Aikman gives '78 as the percentage of sulphur in milk-casein? One other statement needing correction may be cited, although in this case the mistake has only an historical import. On p. 21 we read concerning the fat globules in milk: "It was till comparatively recently believed that they were surrounded by a solid albuminous membrane which became ruptured when milk was churned." In point of fact Quevenne more than thirty years ago demonstrated the absence of this supposed structure, and furnished a true explanation of the state in which the globules of fat subsist in milk. The memoirs of Quevenne are now forgotten, but they were gathered into a volume in 1857—Du Lait, par M. Bouchardat et T. A. Quevenne. It is most interesting to note how many of the conclusions derived from the recent study of milk-chemistry were anticipated in this book. Even the determination of the "albuminose, matière appelée depuis peptone par M. Lehmann," in cow's milk tallies exactly ('11 per cent. as an average) with the latest results.

Justus von Liebig, His Life and Work, 1803-1873. By W. A. Shenstone. (Cassells.) This new volume of the "Century Science" series may be read with intelligent interest even by those who are not conversant with chemical terminology. For only in parts of a couple of chapters in this biography of a great chemist has Mr. Shenstone found it necessary to employ the language and introduce the symbols of the science. No reader possessed of ordinary culture can study this memoir without learning that Liebig was something other and something more than "a man who gained a large fortune by making extract of meat." The devotee of science may, indeed, find too little pure science in these pages, the lover of stories of personal and private life too much; but Mr. Shenstone has certainly succeeded in drawing a charming picture of Liebig the man and of Liebig the investigator and teacher. The first of the nine chapters comprised in this volume deals with the early years of the great chemist, with his introduction to science and its chief apostles, and with his invention of the method of analysing organic compounds. Liebig's scientific collaboration and intimate friendship with Wöhler, and the outcome of their joint researches, are described in chap. ii. In the next chapter some of the chief discoveries of Liebig are recorded, though only in barest outline. The attitude of Liebig in regard to the views and discoveries of his great French contemporary Dumas is described in chap. iv. Fermentation is discussed in chap. v.; in chap. vi. Liebig's work in connexion with agriculture, and in the following chapter his researches on the chemistry and offices of food. Liebig's educational work forms the subject of chap. viii. In the last chapter the dominant personal characteristics of Liebig are portrayed, while references are made to the chief incidents of his later days, his relations with English men of science, and his correspondence with Wöhler, Berzelius, and Renning. But Mr. Shenstone's Life of Justus von Liebig is a book to which justice cannot be done in a brief notice, nor even by copious quotation. Its careful summaries of character, of work, of opinions, and of controversies must be steadily perused from beginning to end, to be appreciated. The biographer is at once well-informed and fair: inclined, perhaps, to look leniently upon his hero's occasional failings in the conduct of controversy, and to regard with lingering affection some of his obsolete or incomplete views, but on the whole dealing impartially with the several problems discussed.

A Laboratory Manual of Organic Chemistry. By Dr. Lassar-Cohn. Translated by Alexander Smith, of the University of Chicago. (Macmillans.) The abbreviated title given on the cover of this volume, "A Manual of Organic Chemistry," is misleading. For the work really covers a field but imperfectly occupied hitherto. It is, in fact, a compendium of laboratory methods for preparing organic compounds, not a history of the compounds themselves. The author justly remarks in his preface that "the text-books on organic chemistry usually treat the practical side of the science in a very perfunctory manner. The reader may even get the impression that there are no difficulties in the way of realising the actions expressed in the most complicated equations, and that the yields calculable from the equations will invariably be attained in practice."

In actual work the results commonly secured diverge widely from those which theory promises. To minimise the proportion of by-products, and to obtain a good yield of the desired substance, demands, in most cases, the fulfilment of several conditions, physical as well as chemical. Dr. Lassar-Cohn presents in this manual a classified series of methods, and gives the necessary data for carrying them out in a large number of specific and typical cases. His treatment of the subject is full, but does not pretend to be exhaustive. We have looked in his pages for a selected number of test cases, and have found the great majority of the sought-for processes duly described. Here and there defects or errors may occur: as, for instance, where (p. 246) the use of barium peroxide in the preparation of organic peroxides, discovered in the laboratory of Balliol College, Oxford, in the year 1857, is assigned to the year 1884 and to Dr. Lippmann. But the volume is a substantial contribution to the library of the working organic chemist, and is as conscientious in execution as it is admirable in plan. It has no competitors; for the small English handbooks which we previously possessed, one by Dr. Emerson Reynolds, one by Dr. Julius B. Cohen, and a third by Dr. W. R. Orndorff, are of more restricted scope. Dr. Lassar-Cohn's treatise is divided into two parts. In the first of these general methods are described in eleven chapters, devoted to Baths, Crystallisation, Decolorisation, Distillation, Desiccation, Extraction, Filtration, Melting-point and Molecular Weight Determinations, Sealed Tubes, and Sublimation. One hundred pages are given to the treatment of the above-named topics, while three times that space is assigned to special methods. These are discussed in twelve chapters, having such headings as "Condensation," "Preparation of Diazo-Bodies," "Preparation of Halogen Compounds," "Oxidation," "Reduction," and "Saponification." To the book itself we must refer those of our readers who are desirous of studying Dr. Lassar-Cohn's comprehensive and modern treatment of these and kindred topics.

The Scientific Foundations of Analytical Chemistry. By W. Ostwald. Translated by G. M'Gowan. (Macmillans.) To do justice to this original and valuable treatise one would need to make abstracts of each of its thirteen chapters, and to cite passages from at least a score of its pages. In a brief notice it is not possible even to indicate the freshness and fulness which are such prominent characteristics of Dr. Ostwald's scientific treatment of chemical analysis. Hitherto, as the author observes in his preface, it is the technique of laboratory operations, not their philosophical bases, which has been so highly developed. Dr. Ostwald, in the volume under review, has brought to bear, upon long familiar and daily recurring phenomena and processes, the light afforded by recent theories, such as the general theory of chemical reactions and of states of equilibrium, the theory of solution and of electrolytic dissociation. In fact, the reader is constantly being shown that analysis ought to be regarded from the viewpoint of science, although it has long been considered almost exclusively as an art. Let the analyst, who would form some notion of what Dr. Ostwald has to tell him, read half a dozen of the smaller sections in this volume, such as those on "Absorption Phenomena," "The Enlargement of the Crystalline Grains," and "Colloidal Precipitates" (pp. 18-27); also the sections on "Substances in Solution," "Ions," and "The Varieties of Ions" (pp. 47-56). He will then feel compelled to go carefully through the whole of part i. of the volume, which is entitled "Theory," and will afterwards pass on, with increased interest in the author's novel and systematic treatment of analysis, to part. ii., another hundred pages devoted to "Practical Applications."

CORRESPONDENCE.

FOUR PHOENICIAN INSCRIPTIONS FROM CYPRUS.

I.

Magdalen College, Oxford: Jan. 8, 1896.

Among the treasures excavated at Larnaka, in Cyprus, in 1894 by Mr. J. L. Myers, of Magdalen College, are four Phoenician inscriptions, which have a considerable amount of interest.

(1) The first is inscribed on a stele with a moulded cornice. Below the inscription is a curious device shaped rather like a ploughshare; but what it actually represents it is difficult to say. I can find nothing like it on other figured Phoenician stones. The inscription itself, cut in bold and elegant letters, may be transliterated as follows:

חרש עגלת פגל ז

—i.e.,

"To 'Abd-ashtar, son of Eshmun, the chariot-smith: he made this."

All the letters are perfectly clear and present no difficulty. The stone is broken at the end of the second line, leaving only the letter ' ; but the rest of the word may be readily supplied and the [כרש] read, i.e., "may [the deity] bless [him]": as often on stones from Cyprus, e.g., Corp. Inscr. Semit. 10, 4. 25. 89, 3. 94, 5, &c. As to the form of the letters, they are of the usual type of Phoenician found in Cyprus; N, however, is decorated with a hook at the right end of its lower transverse line, and L with a hook at the top.

The name of the person who set up the pillar to himself (so I understand the sentence) is 'Abd-ashtar, "servant of Ashtar." On the Phoenician inscriptions the name of the deity always has the feminine ending, 'Ashtar = 'Ashtoreth, the goddess Astarte—e.g., C. I. S. 115, 1 (עבדעשתרת), 3, 15, 16, 18, &c.; the only parallel for 'Ashtar is to be found on the Moabite Stone, l. 17, עשור כמש. So we have here either a unique instance of the name 'Ashtar in Phoenician, or else an oversight of the stone-cutter, who left out the final t by mistake.

The first two words of l. 2 are clearly חרש עגלת, which I read עגלת חרש—i.e., "maker of chariots." 'Abd-ashtar describes himself by his profession: he was a chariot-smith. For חרש cf. C. I. S. 86, 13A (cf. 2 Chron. xiv. 12); 64 חרש רב = ἀρχιτέκτων, 274, 3; but in none of these cases is the word used exactly as here. The word עגלת is found in C. I. S. 346, 3, where the donor of the stele adds after his name עץ עגלת—i.e., "[maker of] of chariots of wood." The interest of the phrase in our inscription is that it points to the existence in Cyprus of a regular trade of chariot-smiths; in this case they were makers of metal chariots, as the word חרש implies. It may be added that the chariot is copiously represented in native Cyprian art from the beginning of the Graeco-Phoenician period, while iron was freely worked in Cyprus from the ninth or eighth century onwards; ancient workings are found within twenty miles of Kition.

(2) The next inscription is a small fragment, cut in larger, coarser letters than No. 1. It is as follows:

מצבת ז לם

—i.e.,

"To Shamar . . .
to them."

The proper name in full may have been Shamar-baal (cf. C. I. S. 384). At first I was disposed to read the letters ל ש מ ר "to the name of R . . ."; but this is not a usage found on the Phoenician monuments. It is better to read the letters as a fragment of a proper name. Both 1 and 2 are now in the Nikosia Museum; both were discovered in the necropolis of Kition.

(3) The third inscription is cut in small, clear letters round the brim of what was once a marble basin or vessel of some kind. Only seventeen letters have survived:

אדני בן מלקרת בן מכל ע

—i.e.,

"his lord, the son of Melqarth, the son of Mikal . . ."

The form אדני occurs several times on a group of inscriptions in the somewhat obscure expression בך אדני, which is generally understood as an equivalent for עבד אדני "servant of his lord"; it is just possible that this may have been the phrase here. The N in אדני is only partially preserved; but there is not much doubt about the letter. The last word of the inscription is interesting. מכל is the name of the deity Mikal or Makul (Enting prefers the Mikil from מכול), usually found preceded by רשף, Reshef-Mikal—e.g., C. I. S. 89, 3. 90, 2. 91, 2. 93, 5. 94, 5—all from Cyprus. The letter ע follows מכל on the inscription; and as Mikal here is evidently the name of a person, I would suggest that the full form of the name was מכל עזר Mikal-'azar = "Mikal helps," on the analogy of בעל עזר Baal-'azar, C. I. S. 256, 2. 3. At the same time, it is worth noticing that both in No. 1 and in this inscription, No. 3, the divine names Eshmun and Melqarth are used as personal proper names. This stone is now in the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford. The date of these inscriptions cannot be determined with anything like precision; but the forms of the letters would suggest a date early in the Ptolemaic period, at the close of the fourth or the beginning of the third century B.C.

G. A. COOKE.

[The fourth inscription will be given next week.]

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE evening discourse at the Royal Institution next Friday will be delivered by Prof. Burdon Sanderson, on "Ludwig and Vitalism."

On Monday next, at the Society of Arts, Dr. J. A. Fleming will begin a course of four Cantor Lectures on "Alternate Current Transformers."

At the annual meeting of the Royal Meteorological Society, held on Wednesday of this week, Mr. E. Mawley was elected president, in succession to Mr. R. Inwards.

MR. W. L. SOLATER—assistant master at Eton, but formerly deputy superintendent of the Calcutta Museum—has been appointed to the curatorship of the South African Museum at Capetown, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Roland Trimen. Mr. Solater is a son of the well-known secretary of the Zoological Society.

THE Scientific Press are about to issue a third edition of Mr. Henry C. Burdett's Cottage Hospitals: General, Fever, and Convalescent; their Progress, Management, and Work. As it is fifteen years since the second edition appeared, this work has been practically rewritten, and a great number of new plans, &c., have been introduced.

WE have received from the director-general, Sir Archibald Geikie, the first colour-printed map issued by the Geological Survey. It is on the scale of an inch to four miles, and represents the London Basin and great part of the Wealden area. Hitherto all the Geological Survey maps have been coloured by hand, and the present map was so issued at a price of 10s. 6d. The cost is now 2s. 6d. The Stationery Office has prepared the map as an experiment; and if successful the other sheets completing the map of England and Wales on the same scale will be published, printed in colours.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE fresh transcription of part of the Sinai Gospels which was brought by Mrs. S. S. Lewis from Mount Sinai in the spring of last year will be published by the Cambridge University Press in the course of this month. It will be accompanied by a new and complete edition of her translation, and will take the form of a reprint of about 100 Syriac pages hitherto defective—the complementary portions being in a blue colour, to distinguish them from what was transcribed in 1893 by Messrs. Bensly, Harris, and Burkitt. Each of these pages will bear an additional number in brackets, corresponding with its number in the volume of 1894, for the convenience of those purchasers who wish to interleave the two. A list of the lacunae which still remain, with the reasons for them, will be included in the volume.

THE Clarendon Press will publish immediately Revenue Laws of Ptolemy Philadelphus, edited from a Greek papyrus in the Bodleian Library, with a translation, commentary, and appendices by Mr. B. P. Grenfell, and an introduction by Prof. Mahaffy. The papyrus consists of two rolls, which were obtained by Prof. Flinders Petrie and Mr. Grenfell respectively. It is by far the largest Greek papyrus known; and as it is in several places dated in the twenty-seventh year of Philadelphus, or 259-8 B.C., it is also nearly the oldest. The text volume is accompanied by a portfolio containing thirteen facsimiles.

UNDER the title Apocrypha Sinaitica, by Mrs. Gibson, Messrs. C. J. Clay & Sons will publish in a few weeks two ancient Arabic versions of the Anaphora Pilati, one of them dated A.D. 799, together with a Syriac version transcribed by Mr. J. Rendel Harris; also two Arabic recensions of the Recognitions of Clement, one from Sinai and the other from the British Museum. To these will be added a story entitled "The Preaching of Peter," also dated A.D. 799, and three little tracts concerning the two earliest Bishops of Jerusalem. These will all be accompanied by translations and illustrations.

NEXT week the Northern Counties Publishing Company, of Inverness, will issue an Etymological Dictionary of the Gaelic Language, by Mr. Alexander Macbain. The work will include every word in the Gaelic language, with the parallel words in Irish, Welsh, Cornish, and Breton. The cognate forms in European languages and Sanskrit are referred to; and, where possible, the word is traced to its Aryan root. An interesting feature of the work will be an appendix, in which Mr. Macbain discusses the names and surnames of the Scottish Highlands. This claims to be the first dictionary of the kind that deals thoroughly with any modern Celtic language.

AT the meeting of the Victoria Institute on Monday next, Mr. Theo. G. Pinches, of the British Museum, will read a paper on "Some Newly Deciphered Cuneiform Inscriptions."

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CLIFTON SHAKESPEARE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, Dec. 28.)

ARTHUR S. WAX, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. May read a paper entitled "Falstaff's Cowardice." It has been too often alleged that Shakespeare represented Falstaff to be a thief, coward, and liar, and that therefore he must have meant him to be an object for reprobation. There is a fatal difficulty, however, in accepting this proposition. If Shakespeare meant Falstaff to be an object for reprobation, why did he so egregiously fail? It is too much to be asked to believe that a character, which has been popular beyond all others with those for whom Shakespeare wrote, became so by the blundering workmanship of its creator. To some persons, the Puritans for example, Falstaff was, doubtless, unacceptable. In considering the question of Falstaff's courage or cowardice, we have first to settle our conception of courage. Speaking broadly, we may divide it into (1) heroic courage, (2) moral courage, (3) physical courage. What courage fell to Falstaff's share must have been of the third kind. When young he was a noted swashbuckler. Shallow's reminiscences are a good testimony to the reputation of young Falstaff. He certainly gained and kept a reputation on the strength of which he is appointed "Captain" of foot at the age of sixty, in spite of his unwieldiness. He did his part at Shrewsbury with sufficient fairly earned credit, since we may accept as true the words in his soliloquy, "I have led my ragamuffins where they are peppered; there's not three of my hundred and fifty left alive." So Sir John was well to the front as long as legs and wind lasted; and it says something for his qualities as an officer that he succeeded in making such "pitiful rascals" follow him into the jaws of death. Ten years later we find his services as much in request as ever—"a dozen captains, bare-headed, sweating, knocking at the taverns, and asking everyone for Sir John Falstaff." Can Shakespeare have intended to represent English soldiers as so imposed upon, or the Prince so blind to his own interest at a most perilous crisis, as to actually procure a command in a campaign on which the very existence of his family hung for a man whose military qualities he knew to be a sham? His cowardice is supposed to be proved by his behaviour in single combat with Douglas. But his words are those of a cheery cynic, not of a coward; and he was old, heavy, tired, and out of breath. In the Gadshill affair we note that it is just when the thieves, in fancied security, are proceeding to share the booty that their assailants pounce upon them. It is a night ambuscade, the most unnerving of all forms of attack, and Falstaff's companions flee at once. Now Shakespeare here leaves Falstaff opposed to odds of two to one, yet he does not turn till he has by "a blow or two" made proof of their quality. With the intuition of a practised swordsman, he promptly recognises that they are young, active, and good at their weapons; and that it is death or flight. Of course, it cannot be contended that Falstaff has either the hero or the martyr spirit. He acts upon his maxim—the better part of valour is discretion; none but a desperate, bull-dog fighter would have stayed. In the brief encounter with Douglas he does not shrink the conflict, but maintains it just long enough to perceive that he is hopelessly overmatched; whereupon, with that cool presence of mind which never deserts him, he contrives so to receive Douglas's last blow as to deceive the latter into the belief that he has killed him outright—a neat performance even for an old soldier. Among his followers he is a very paladin. They are cowards indeed, in spite of youth and strength; he is as brave as, considering his physical drawbacks and his cynical disregard of honour, he could well be. In the tavern brawl he promptly crosses swords with Pistol and drives him before him like chaff. It is a curious coincidence that, of all those whom we commonly call "Homer's heroes," two only have that steady, unflinching courage which is subject to no panic, to which we now are disposed to restrict the name. Of these Achilles does not count; he is physically a giant among men, besides being helped by gods. Diomedes is the only one like a Norse Viking or a Roland; and it is curious to find that the old warrior Nestor, the oracle of the army, as being long tried in war and council, publicly rebukes him (ix. 63, 64) for this very trait, declaring that the man who revels in fighting for fighting's sake is worthy to be an outcast from home, from social relations, and from religious rites. All the other leaders, both Greek and Trojan, are daunted by a sudden reverse, and ready to retreat when the battle goes against them. Let us not, then, be harder on Falstaff than the Father of Song was on the heroes of old, but give him credit for the nerve that could let him drop off into peaceful slumbers, even when the sheriff's men were hammering at the door to drag him off to the prison and the hangman's cart.—Mr. L. M. Griffiths read notes on "Some Words used by Shakespeare in '2 Henry IV.' only." He referred with some detail to the points of interest in connexion with "Gravy" (I. ii. 184) and its pronunciation; "Coetermonger" (I. ii. 191); "Bed-hangings" (II. i. 159); "Utis" (II. iv. 22); "Watch-case" (III. i. 17); "Pricked" (II. iv. 359, III. ii. 125, 153, 162); "Potable" (IV. v. 163); "Husband" = husbandman (V. iii. 12); "The Fleet" (V. v. 97).

ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY.—(Imperial Institute, Tuesday, Jan. 7.)

E. A. OZALET, Esq., president, in the chair.—A paper was read, in Russian, by M. De Bogdanovich, on "The Results of Russian Civilisation in Central Asia." After a short historical summary of the great movement of Russia, proving the correct forecast of Peter the Great, that Russia had a civilising mission to perform in Asia, M. De Bogdanovich referred to the present condition of Central Asia, quoting the words of the Russian members of the Pamir Boundary Commission when the last boundary post was sunk: "Here lies the Pamir question." As no Central Asian problem seems to exist, it is to be hoped that the wish expressed by General Kouropatkine to an English officer will soon be realised. He said: "I like to meet the English in Asia, not to fight, but to advance together, shoulder to shoulder, along the same path, spreading civilisation among the people we have subjugated in Asia." Until 1865 the Russians met no obstacle or armed intervention among the Khirgiz of the Steppes, and all was peacefully annexed, thanks to a great principle: "Always respect the faith and customs of the people conquered." From 1865 to 1876 Russia had to cope with the armed Khanates in Central Asia; and this eleven years' war resulted in the annexation of 600,000 square miles, with a population of three and a half million Mohammedans. In 1882 Russia annexed the Turcomans and 73,000 square miles, with a population of seven millions. Since that time, with peace and tranquillity, the interests of Russia are immovably established in Central Asia—immovably, because Turkestan was not conquered, but annexed; and the first pioneers found there a second fatherland, and not a place of exile. They treated the natives as brothers, according to the law of Christ; consequently there is no idea of rebellion. The natives know that their religion, property, and the fruit of their labour are secured to them under Russian rule; they appreciate the recent development of trade and the extension of their markets. Now they are able peacefully to develop the rich resources of their country, and have put aside their primitive agricultural methods and tools. The first pioneers under General Kaufman had a great task set before them. They had to renovate, if not to create, every branch of industry, agriculture, rearing of cattle, &c. They taught the natives a new life, setting before them a better ideal, in short, a new civilisation. This task was admirably performed, to the glory of Russia and to the credit of its early pioneers. The first care of the Government is to look after irrigation, because the welfare of the country depends on a good water supply, and also because the Russian idea of colonising is to increase the area of cultivated soil belonging to the natives. We now reckon almost eighty Russian villages, with a number of churches and schools, founded since the annexation. M. De Bogdanovich explained the progress realised in all directions in that part of Asia; also the actual condition of the silk and cotton industries, of the rice plantations, forests, vineyards, vegetable gardens, orchards, and fishing, especially the sturgeon fisheries in Lake Aral. The mineral wealth is immense, but it has not yet been developed. M. De Bogdanovich laid stress on the question of education, and the solicitude of the Government for the health of the people. The Transcaspian Railway is a great source of material progress as regards the exchange of products between Asia and Russia, though still inadequate for the wants of the population. Large caravans have to carry merchandises to Siberia, and the towns of Uralak and Orenburg. The projects of establishing railway lines to connect the south-west of Russia with Tashkend, Siberia, and Turkestan are now under consideration, and most probably will soon be executed. These two lines will enormously increase the wealth and prosperity of the country. They meet the desires of the mercantile community and the local Press. The Press was spoken of in high terms by M. De Bogdanovich. Directed by men of intellect and ability, it has always adopted a peaceful and friendly tone towards its neighbour, British India. Having explained the benefits conferred by Russia on the people of Central Asia, and the results of her civilisation, the lecturer quoted the authority of eminent travellers and explorers from Western Europe in confirmation of his opinions: namely, E. Blanc in his Colonisation Russe dans l'Asie Centrale, Leclerc in his Conférence before the Société Géographique Royale de Bruxelles, and Sir Henry Rawlinson in a lecture to the Royal Geographical Society, and also the recent evidence furnished by Major-General M. G. Gerard, who travelled through Central Asia on his return from the Pamirs to London.—General Gerard was prevented from being present, but sent a letter expressing his regret, as also did Sir Donald M. Wallace.—Mr. Brayley Hodgetts entirely agreed with the remark attributed to General Kouropatkine, that it would be desirable that Englishmen and Russians should work together for the civilisation and development of those regions in Asia which were in the sphere of their influence; and as a proof in point he said that a Russian engineer had been in Egypt in order to study the English system of irrigation from the Nile, in order to apply it with satisfactory results to Central Asia. He further related several instances of the manner in which Russians had assisted him during his travels in Russia and in the East, and also referred with special pleasure to some occasions when he had been able to be useful to them.—Captain Cuppge, who had lately returned from India, where he had served in the Intelligence Department, bore testimony to the cordial relations which existed between Russian and English officers during the delimitation of the Pamir boundary. He had been told by Captain MacSwiney, who had accompanied General Gerard on that occasion, that after the boundary work had been completed the English and Russian officers embraced each other in Russian fashion on parting.—The President expressed the best thanks of the society to M. De Bogdanovich for his excellent paper, which was doubly interesting as the lecturer had seen things with his own eyes, and communicated the result of his personal experience. In Eastern countries (as he had himself seen when travelling in Persia) the man who owned the water played as important a part as the sole banker in some small place in Europe, and could easily ruin his poorer neighbour by refusing to supply him with water. Without in any way desiring to depreciate the importance and utility of the good work which Russia had done in Central Asia, he ventured to say that the latter had been in so wretched a condition that any change might be considered an improvement. He was also of opinion that Russian civilisation, possessing a tinge of the Oriental, could be more easily understood and assimilated by the natives. It was a curious fact that the Jews in Central Asia, who were few in numbers, had the greatest percentage of children in the schools. In conclusion, he expressed the earnest hope that, as the English members of the society employed every endeavour to raise Russia and the Russians in the opinion of this country, Russian members would facilitate the task by performing the same good office towards us, and not be influenced by a portion of the Press in both countries, whose object appeared to be to estrange the mutual good feeling and to sow dissension, instead of encouraging a good understanding for the benefit of all concerned.

ELIZABETHAN SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, Jan. 8.)

FREDERICK ROGERS, Esq., in the chair.—Miss Grace Latham read a paper on "The Origin and Outcome of the Fads and Fashions of Elizabethan Love-making." She remarked that all writers, even the very greatest, need for thorough appreciation some knowledge of their times, and that this was especially the case with the curious love customs of the time of Elizabeth. They began in Provence among the troubadours, and came to England in the twelfth century, but obtained acceptance only among the higher classes, and after a time nearly died out. They had also, however, been imported into Italy, where they took firm root. Every lady had her servant, or "servant," and there grew up a whole literature of amatory poems. Chief among these poets were Dante and Petrarch. No one can miss seeing the influence the latter has had upon the Elizabethan poets, who copied his numerous classical allusions, his quaint conceits, and forced metaphors, which compare the most dissimilar objects. The travelled English brought Italian poetry and Italian customs back with them, and they were eagerly adopted by the nation. However, where the Italian is strained and scholarly, the Englishman pours out the fresh passion of the younger nation; where the one, to whom love in marriage was an unheard of necessity, sang for twenty years a love that had, and perhaps was hardly intended to have, an outcome, the other wooed his lady and, winning, married her, hoping to find his ideal in the mutual service of the married state. These were the serious lovers, who meant what they said in good earnest; but there were a host of others who took up the same fashions, for amusement or self-interest only; both classes adopted many strange fashions, posing as and acting the lover for the benefit of the world in general. There was a recognised costume, either a much dishevelled attire or an extravagantly smart one, a special cut of hair and beard, a certain form of address and demeanour. The lady's favour was worn, laboriously echoing the daily or hourly changes in her attire. Poems were served up to her of the gentleman's own invention, or else bought or stolen by him from others. Conversation became a fatiguing tournament for the exhibition of wit, of which sort of combat we find many examples in Shakspeare. When these customs were followed by the real and earnest lovers they received the stamp of truth and became alive; and to such we owe much of our most splendid literature—as the poems of Sir Philip Sidney, the sonnets of Shakspeare, of Spenser, and many others. The difference between the real and fictitious lover is seen in "Romeo and Juliet." We find Romeo with an ideal passion for Rosaline, breaking his heart and his rest for her, but in the most self-conscious fashion expressing himself in far-fetched images after the model of Petrarch; but at the sight of Juliet, although the same class of metaphors are employed, the self-consciousness vanishes, he is absorbed in her and her only. Miss Latham compared his first love to that of Dante for Beatrice in the Vita Nuova, while pointing out that the first was the idealisation of a hopeless passion, the second the idealisation of a woman. She then went on to show that Shakspeare had passed over the obvious evil outcome of these customs, but had shown us another, more truly inherent in them: namely, that all posing and impersonation intended to be accepted as truth was a moral falsehood, and involved a gradual degradation of character and actual misfortune, as it set the personator at variance with the real facts of life, and prevented him from grappling properly with them. For this the examples were taken from "Twelfth Night."—The discussion which followed was opened by the chairman, and continued by Mr. Frank Payne, Mr. W. H. Cowham, Mr. A. O. Haywood, Mr. J. A. Jenkinson, and Mr. James Ernest Baker.

FINE ART.

Etching in England. By Frederick Wedmore. (Bell.)

THIS book is welcome for many reasons; but, in spite of the old saying about a gift-horse, I wish that it were better. It is nicely printed in a large and comfortable type; it is of a pleasant size; it contains over fifty examples (generally well-chosen) of twenty-six etchers; and the text is written by a critic who has some special claim to speak on the subject. The book also occupies, as the author implies in his preface, a place not hitherto filled, as it is devoted to a survey,

"not of good etched work generally, nor of all etched work—all popular etched work—wrought in England, but of such work as has been wrought in England of the finer and truer kind."

What is "the finer and truer kind" is, of course, a matter of opinion; and I confess I do not quite understand why such etchers as Cope, Hills, and Landseer should be completely ignored. But, as Mr. Wedmore does not, as we understand his words, pretend to be exhaustive, there is no reason to quarrel with his selection, as all, or at least nearly all, of the etchers he has chosen use the needle with a true sense of its peculiar capacities and limits as a means of artistic expression.

Although Mr. Wedmore intentionally abstains "from discoursing much upon methods," his criticism is mainly technical in a large sense. His brief notices of Turner and Girtin are almost entirely confined to the limited intention of their etched work; he contrasts Wilkie and Geddes to the disadvantage of the former from the point of view of the pure etcher; and this line is maintained so consistently throughout the work that we are somewhat surprised that he should have included Samuel Palmer at all, and disappointed that he does not say more in justification of the apparent exception he has made in his favour. To say that it would be pedantic to condemn him "because he was not a free sketcher" is to say little, because there is nothing at all of the sketch about his etchings. They are as elaborate as his pictures in water-colours. They aim at the most complete and complicated effects of light and shade. Moreover, they express everything without any line, in the etcher's sense of that word. One thing, however, Mr. Wedmore does say about him which is true and well said: "The unity and strength of his thought was never sacrificed or frittered by the elaboration of his labour." Might it be contended that the ultimate effect produced was one which could scarcely have been effected by any other artistic means, and that therefore his employment of the needle was as legitimate as that of the "pure line" etchers? This is a question on which it would have been interesting to have learnt the opinion of Mr. Wedmore. To me it appears that Palmer's art was based upon that of Blake, and that he sought for those effects of irradiated gloom which that artist had produced by woodcuts or etchings "in relief"; or, in other words, that he really worked from black to white instead of from white to black, and that his art was just the converse of that of the woodcutter who uses the "black" instead of the "white" line. If this view be correct, Palmer's practice was a topsy-turvy one, and his example shows how the most perverse methods may be made to achieve triumphant results when employed by a man of genius.

No such questions arise in connexion with the later etchers represented in the work, all of whom (with the exception, perhaps, of Mr. Herkomer) have the true feeling of the etcher. In writing of them all, however, to use his own phrase, Mr. Wedmore is sometimes "provokingly thin," and sometimes rather too personal. He shows a knowledge and a discrimination which only come of sympathy and study; and he not unfrequently succeeds in conveying subtle qualities and almost indefinable impressions by deft arrangement of words. If he sometimes fails, or seems to fail, in his verbal experiments, and the reader has a difficulty in disengaging his precise meaning, no one will be surprised who has himself engaged in the Ixion-like task of expressing in words the delicate flavours of works of art. The most important and fully considered of his short essays are those on the elder and best known of the group—Sir F. Seymour Haden, Mr. Whistler, M. Legros, and Mr. William Strang. If that on Mr. Whistler seem too much addressed to the connoisseur, and if the writer's estimate of Mr. Strang does not do full justice to that artist's power of imaginative design, they are all very capable and sincere. His own true feeling for the art is, perhaps, still more shown in his selection of the younger men like Mr. Frank Short, Mr. Charles Holroyd, Mr. Oliver Hall, Colonel Goff, and Mr. D. Y. Cameron; and it is easy to pardon the irresistible impulse which compelled him to include the fascinating genius of Mr. Helleu in his survey of Etching in England.

The vivacity and elegance of this artist are fairly well preserved in the prints, which add a charm to the concluding pages of the book; and I wish that similar praise could be extended to the whole of the illustrations. The processes by which the etchings have been translated act in a very capricious and arbitrary manner. The highly pressed paper upon which they are printed deprives all of them of one of the most distinctive charms of etchings—the harmonious blending of paper and ink. In these prints the two elements are always in contrast and often in antagonism. It is only in well-covered plates, like that after Samuel Palmer, that any of the tonic beauty of the original is preserved. In some cases, like both of Geddes's plates, the result is disastrous. Mr. Whistler's "Piazzetta" is caricatured into a restless piece of patchwork, and Sir F. Seymour Haden's "Windmill Hill" is black and blurred. In some other cases (those of M. Legros and Mr. Strang for example) the selection is unhappy and inadequate. Indeed, it is only occasionally—as in Mr. Holroyd's "Midnight Mass," Mr. Oliver Hall's "Landscape with Trees," Colonel Goff's "Chain Pier, Brighton," Mrs. Stanhope Forbes's "The Open Window," Mr. Holmes May's "Sunrise in Wales," and Mr. Alfred East's "A Hurrying Wind"—that the quality of the etching or the intention of the artist is tolerably rendered.

COSMO MONKHOUSE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE Fine Art Society have made arrangements to hold an exhibition, towards the end of the present month, of examples of the new invention by which Mr. Herkomer claims that he can convert a painted surface into a plate suitable for printing from, without the intervention of photography or any preliminary process of biting, &c. The exhibition will consist of some forty plates; and Mr. Herkomer has promised to give a practical demonstration of the entire process.

AN exhibition of a series of water-colour drawings by Mr. J. Laurence Hart, entitled "In Shakspeare's Country," will open next week in St. George's Gallery, Grafton-street.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN announces for immediate publication a Cyclopaedia of Architecture in Italy, Greece, and the Levant, edited by Mr. N. P. P. Longfellow. It will be illustrated with photogravure plates and engravings in the text, and will also contain a glossary and an exhaustive bibliography.

AT the meeting of the Royal Institute of British Architects on Monday next, the president (Mr. Penrose) will present the prizes to the students, and also deliver an address.

THE American School at Athens have obtained the sanction of the Greek Government to excavate on the site of Old Corinth.

THE Department of Science and Art has received, through the Foreign Office, a communication from Her Majesty's Consul at Barcelona, stating that it is proposed to hold a Fine Art and Industrial Exhibition in that city, commencing on April 23.

PROF. A. KNACKFUSS, author of the Deutsche Kunstgeschichte, has been appointed to succeed

Geheimrath Jordan as director of the Berlin National Gallery.

ON Tuesday next Messrs. Sotheby will begin the sale of the collection of coins, &c., formed by the late William Boyne, of which the first portion will occupy altogether ten days. Mr. Boyne, who is best known for his Catalogue of Seventeenth Century Tokens, was an insatiable collector of coins and medals of all sorts. In mere quantity, he had no rival among private collectors; for he is said to have amassed no less than 30,000 pieces. But, of course, in rarity and in numismatic interest, his cabinet cannot be compared with that of the late Samuel Montagu. The present portion consists of 1832 lots, including a considerable library of books. It is confined to Greek, Roman, and English coins, the entire foreign series being reserved for a later occasion. There are also a number of historical and war medals.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Gluck and the Opera: a Study in Musical History. By Ernest Newman. (Bertrand Dobell.)

OUR author, in his Preface, briefly sums up all that has hitherto been written of importance respecting Gluck and his times. After A. Schmid's C. W. Ritter von Gluck, which contains "almost everything that is known of the life of the composer," and A. B. Marx's Gluck und die Oper, in which details are included "that have been overlooked by Schmid," Mr. Newman has nothing new to tell us about the man. The special aim of the book may be given in the author's own words: "I have rather endeavoured to view the subject philosophically and to bring the opera of the eighteenth century in general, and Gluck's work in particular, into line with the whole intellectual tendencies of the time." He addresses himself to the general student of culture, who can derive little benefit from the technical criticism so prevalent at the present day. Mr. Newman not only objects to such criticism, but also to the metaphysical method adopted by Wagner in his æsthetic writings. Surely, however, he misrepresents Wagner in asserting that he regarded poetry and music as two "entities" originally united. Wagner, if we have read him aright, regarded them as originally being only parts of a whole: Dance, Tone, and Poetry he described as a "trinity of sisters."

After this philosophical flourish it is somewhat disappointing to find about two-thirds of the volume devoted to the life of Gluck, to a description of the plots of his operas, and to extracts from other writers. There is no complaint to make on the score of interest, and such preliminary matter will no doubt be appreciated by the general student in history. It might, however, have occupied less space.

The real interest of the book commences at page 200, with Gluck's relations to the intellectual life of his epoch. Here we have a discussion of the artificial opera born of the Renaissance and of the "lyrical flood" which followed. The latter in itself was no evil, but only the abuse that was made of lyrical means; and to account for that abuse our author appeals to the social and political circumstances and the flaccid intellectual life of the time. It is impossible to deny the influence which public events and public taste exercise on artistic minds; yet it seems to us that too much may be ascribed to environment, which, after all, has only modifying power. In Haydn and Mozart we see how they sometimes lowered themselves to the spirit of their time; how at other times they rose above it. Mr. Newman himself, in speaking of Gluck, remarks how, "in the teeth of all the opposition of foolishness, conventionality, and sham," he made his music "manly, truthful, and sincere." It is over composers of the second rank—such men as J. C. Bach, Gyrowetz, Hasse, Jommelli, Salieri—that taste and fashion cast a malignant and lasting spell. Truly great men are the outcome partly of the age in which they live, but principally of the ages which preceded them.

Here, again, in his philosophical section, Mr. Newman gives frequent extracts from other writers, all of them appropriate, and some extremely pithy. Saint-Evremond, speaking of the opera of his day, said:

"If you wish to know what an opera is, I answer that it is a strange production of poetry and music, in which the poet and the musician, each bored by the other, take the utmost possible trouble to produce a worthless performance."

Special attention is called to Algarotti's remarkable book, Saggio dall' Opera in Musica (Leghorn, 1763), in which there are striking anticipations of Gluck's reforms and of Wagner's art-theories. Mr. Newman may well ask, "Had Gluck seen Algarotti's work?" He thinks it highly probable, for the book speedily gained European fame. An English translation of it was published at Glasgow only five years after its appearance.

At one time Gluck spoke of music in opera as the handmaid of poetry; at a later period, of the equality of poetry and music. Our author does not attempt to harmonise these two contradictory statements "by a process of ingenious dialectic," but with sweet reasonableness looks upon them as "expressions of Gluck's ideas at two different epochs." That the composer wavered in opinion is not surprising. The first statement was made in connexion with "Alceste," the second in connexion with "Armide," two works of very different nature; in one the dramatic, in the other the lyrical element predominated. Mr. Newman mentions the Essai sur l'Union de la Poésie et de la Musique of the Chevalier de Chastellux, in which that writer held "that the music should dominate the poetry in opera," and states that this "essay drew forth the commendations of Metastasio." Yet the latter wrote to the author as follows:

"Most respected Chevalier, whenever music aims at pre-eminence over poetry in a drama, she destroys both that and herself. It would be too great an absurdity for clothes to claim superiority over the person for whom they are made."

This study of Gluck affords much material for comment, but we have said enough to show that it is a serious piece of writing. It contains valuable information, and it is the outcome of wide reading. A fuller index would have been welcome. The book deserves to be read; and a careful perusal of it will bring both pleasure and profit. We expect that Mr. Newman will follow it up with a similar study of Wagner.

RECENT THEOLOGY.

A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Judges. By George F. Moore. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.)

A History of the Hebrews. By R. Kittel. Vol. I. Translated by John Taylor, D.Lit. (Williams & Norgate.)

Philosophy of Theism. By A. C. Fraser. (Blackwoods.)

The Christian Doctrine of Immortality. By S. D. F. Salmond. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.)

UNDISTURBED by the barbarous noises that environ it, the higher criticism proceeds on its way with the calm authority of an inductive science, "by the known rules of ancient liberty." Prof. Moore, of Andover, follows up Canon Driver's volume on Deuteronomy with a commentary on Judges in the same series, marked by as great learning—it could not be greater—and perhaps by somewhat more freedom of expression. Prof. Moore seems to know everything that can be known about his subject. He has examined every word, every letter of the original text under the microscope. He has studied every old translation in every reading. He has listened to what Rabbinical learning has to say. He has sifted out from the innumerable guesses of explorers whatever could serve to identify the localities mentioned. He has unravelled and compared all the modern theories relating to the sources of the narrative and to the story of its composition. Weariest task of all, he has hunted up Prof. Sayce's missing references to "the monuments," sought for evidence of his assertions, and found it wanting. The primary result of this herculean labour is to confirm in its main outlines the reconstruction of Judges already effected by criticism, and laid before the English reader by Canon Driver in his Introduction. We have, first, a fragmentary account of the conquest of Canaan, quite inconsistent with that given in the Book of Joshua, and apparently much more authentic; then, a continuous narrative, made up of old heroic legends arranged in a didactic framework by a writer of the Deuteronomist school; then, two loose appendices, in the second of which the hand of the post-exilic Priestly narrator may be easily detected. Prof. Moore thinks that some of the pre-Deuteronomist stories may, like those of the Hexateuch, be split into sections due respectively to J and E—not necessarily the J and E of Genesis, but their continuators in the same style.

Should any sceptically conservative reader ask: How can Prof. Moore or anyone else know all this? I answer: Just as you, if you have the least knowledge of architecture, can tell at once on looking at some Italian church, that the façade is only half finished, that the chapels are in the baroque style, that the nave and aisles are late Gothic, the crypt Lombard, and the columns of the crypt Pagan. No doubt, in the case of buildings documentary evidence is often forthcoming; but the same conclusions would have been valid in its absence on the simple testimony of brick and stone, plus common sense. But as regards Judges, in one instance the desired evidence is actually forthcoming. Criticism has disinterred from this composite structure, like a fossil from a rock, but more living than any fossil, one document of supreme interest and value—the Song of Debórah, "the oldest extant monument of Hebrew literature." Its antiquity has indeed been denied by M. Maurice Vernes. But M. Vernes is rather an a priori theorist than a real critic; and neither his arguments against the authenticity of the Song, nor those of Seinecke, commend themselves to Prof. Moore (pp. 129 sq.), who looks on it as "the only contemporaneous monument of Hebrew history before the foundation of the kingdom" (p. 132), though not the work of Debórah herself. Now, this document gives us a version of the war and of the death of Sisera varying in more than one important particular from the prose narrative which precedes it. In the Song Sisera is himself Israel's chief enemy, not the lieutenant of Jabin, who belongs to a quite different story partially preserved in Joshua. In the Song Jael kills Sisera while he is occupied in drinking from a great bowl of milk, "with a blow that crushes in his skull" (p. 135); in the prose narrative more treacherously by driving a nail through his forehead while he is lying down asleep. What is much more important, the Song incidentally reckons Israel's military strength at forty thousand men, a number totally irreconcilable with the statistics of the Priestly narrative, and pointing also to a large subsequent incorporation of the indigenous Canaanite population, if the numbers of David's census are to be accepted; pointing also to a process of gradual infiltration rather than one of high-handed invasion and conquest. And, as Prof. Moore observes, since the Song ignores Judah, "it is hard to avoid the inference that the poet did not count it among the tribes of Israel" (p. 134, note); though how far this affects the credibility of Judges i. is a question which critics do not seem to have very satisfactorily probed.

Prof. Moore regards Gideon's three hundred men as the original amount of his army, corresponding to the small scale of warlike operations at that time, and the ephod which he made from the spoils as a veritable idol which nobody then thought it wrong to worship. From Jephthah's story we learn that "the reality and power of the national god of Moab were no more doubted by the old Israelites than those of Yahveh himself" (p. 294); while that Jephthah's vow involved the offering of a human victim to Yahveh is "as plain as words can make it" (p. 299). Our commentator, without maintaining the historical character of Samson's exploits, does not agree with those who resolve the hero into a solar myth, but thinks that, bearing a name akin to Shemesh the Sun, he would "attract and absorb elements of an originally mythical character, such as the foxes in the cornfields perhaps represent (p. 365, an appropriate number!)." It would, I think, be difficult to find a collection of stories evincing such a low moral tone as this book of Judges. From beginning to end it presents a picture of savage vindictiveness, sometimes accompanied by unrebuked treachery, and unrelieved by one gentle or generous trait. The conduct of the Levite who gives up his concubine to save himself (chap. xix.) is justly stigmatised as "quite as bad as the conduct of the mob in the street"; and Prof. Moore goes on to observe that "the ancient Hebrews were far from possessing the chivalrous feeling which we find among the old Arabs" (p. 418). All the more honour to the great prophets who afterwards set up so high an ethical standard!

Canon Cheyne, who introduces Prof. Kittel to the English public, occupies himself a much more advanced position than the German critic; but he seems to think that the "earnest desire of the latter not to deviate more than is absolutely necessary from tradition" will commend his work to the English public better than the adoption of more radical methods. I think this a mistake. After our countrymen—and, remembering Miss Julia Wedgwood, I may add our countrywomen—have been initiated by Robertson Smith into the higher criticism of the Old Testament under its most developed form, it will not help them to be thrown back on the position occupied by a belated disciple of Dillmann. Father Ignatius and his latest convert, Prof. Sayce, will be just as reluctant to accept Kittel's position as Wellhausen's; while to the scientific theologian it will seem much less logical. There is no need for me to go into details about Kittel's pleas for the pre-exilic origin of the Priestly Code and for the historical value of the patriarchal history, as I discussed them in the ACADEMY some years ago on the first appearance of his book, and a second reading has not altered my opinion of their weakness. The translation is, on the whole, very well done, but would be improved by a few corrections. Like other translators, Dr. Taylor seems sometimes to forget that a German mile is "as long as one can smoke a German pipe," or, more exactly, one-fifteenth of a degree of latitude, and therefore should not be simply rendered by the English word mile. But it is in the "History of Criticism" that one finds the most careless work. We have an historical standpoint described as "universally suggestive" (p. 44), where Kittel wrote, more intelligibly, "ungemein fruchtbar," "uncommonly," or "extraordinarily" suggestive. The famous "Grundschrift," known, I think, to English criticism as the Fundamental Document, here appears under the uncouth appellation "Foundation Writing," which Hupfeld recognises as "supplemented by the Yahvist, otherwise, indeed, than Tuch and his friends, without the Levitical Law" (ib.). "Differing in this respect from Tuch" would be a more intelligible wording. It seems a clumsy way of expressing Graf's inference from the indissoluble connexion of the Elohist History with the Elohist Law, to describe it as being "not that the Law has been taken up by the History into the ancient time, but that on the contrary the History has been brought down by the Law into the post-exile period" (p. 45), instead of saying simply, if with less absolute literalness, "the antiquity of the Law is not proved by the antiquity of the History, but, on the contrary, the post-exilian date of the History is proved by the post-exilian date of the Law." According to the translation, Kleinert strove to displace Graf's fulcrum by assigning an early date—at latest the time of Samuel—to Deuteronomy; "Graf, on the other hand, having admitted that it was prior to the Foundation Writing" (p. 46). Now people are not generally said to admit what they contend for as the very gist of their case; and Kittel, as I understand him, means something quite different. His words are: "hingegen Graf das Zugeständnis der Priorität des Deuteronomiums gegenüber der Grundschrift macht," which I take to mean, "while he [Kleinert] concedes to Graf the priority of Deuteronomy as compared with the Fundamental Document."

Returning to Edinburgh University as Gifford Lecturer sixty years after he first entered its precincts as a young student, Prof. Fraser proves that age has neither dimmed the brightness of his speculative vision, nor impaired the vigour of his style. But he seems to me more effective as an adverse critic than as a constructive theologian. His object in this first series of lectures is to compare and contrast Theism, or the belief in a personal God, with the rival positions of Materialism, Pantheism (better known as solipsism—the extreme form of subjective idealism), Pantheism, and Agnosticism. Defence and attack are carried on, as might be expected from the classic editor of Berkeley's works, mainly on Berkeleyan lines. Materialism may be cheerfully surrendered to his dissolving analysis, and subjective idealism may be fairly called on to choose between Pantheism and Agnosticism. But Prof. Fraser does not seem to me to cope successfully with either of the last-mentioned alternatives. He puts up Spinoza as the chief representative of Pantheism, whereas, in the present stage of thought, it would be much better represented by Hegel, or by one of his living English disciples. And even Spinoza is not fairly faced. After repeated perusals of the Ethica, I cannot admit that individual things figure in it as "illusions of the imagination" (p. 166). The maxim omnis determinatio est negatio does not support so sweeping an assertion. A thing's determination or limit is not the thing itself. I appeal to my reader to know whether he personally feels bound to choose between infinity and non-existence. Nor does Spinoza, as I understand him, affirm that "the finite can be only a negation of the Infinite, never a positive reality" (p. 167). He says on his very first page that one body is bounded by another, and one thought by another; and the whole drift of his ethical teaching is to identify goodness with reality. Again, although Spinoza over and over again identifies the attribute of extension with the procession of causes and effects, "the illusion of dynamical succession" is a phrase employed to describe his theory. I must also object to having modern Agnosticism characterised as "universal needence." To know phenomena only may not be enough, but it is knowing a good deal. And the theist in his turn has to confess a necessary needence. One of Mr. Sully's terrible little questioners would soon reduce him to silence. How does God know that there is anything but Himself? If He created all things it must have been at a certain definite moment, and why at one rather than at another? If He did not create matter (and this seems to be Prof. Fraser's opinion) we get something necessarily conceived as consisting of parts related to one another, which, according to the lecturer, implies intelligence, implies, that is to say, another God, and so on ad infinitum. It is significant that T. H. Green, who also worked his way to an eternal consciousness through the philosophy of perception, did not feel bound to invest it with personality.

Like Johnson's friend Dr. Adams, Dr. Salmond thinks that we have "proofs enough of immortality." According to him, Christianity has turned "a probability into a certainty" (p. 582). If he is right, it has also turned a source of possible hope into a revelation of despair. After a very careful examination of every passage in the Gospels and in the Apostolic literature bearing on this momentous question, he arrives at the conclusion that a number of human beings are doomed to suffer unending punishment in the future world. Prof. Salmond is no narrow literalist, no hide-bound traditionalist theologian. That he should be associated with Dr. Briggs in the editorship of the International Theological Library is a sufficient guarantee of his liberality; and his present volume gives evidence throughout of rare learning, honesty, and dialectical power. His appalling creed seems to have been imposed on him by irresistible authority, not indeed by the authority of the Christian Churches, although they are almost unanimous on this point, but by the authority of Scripture texts, the ultima ratio of orthodox Protestantism. It seems to me that, so far as this goes, Prof. Salmond has made out his case. Infinite ingenuity has been expended in order to extract some glimmer of hope for the damned from the reported words of Christ or from the written words of His Apostles, but in vain. Under the ancien régime Damians was tortured for not more than one whole day before being put to death. Some theologians have hoped that their God would imitate at a vast distance the clemency of Louis XV., that after some ages of punishment He would liberate His creatures from their sufferings by annihilation, or rather that He would cease to keep them miraculously alive to be tormented. Prof. Salmond has proved that even so much mercy cannot be expected. The ferocious vindictiveness of ancient Israel was, like the Temple and its sacrifices, a shadow and type of things to be.

Clear and explicit are the threatenings of the Christian revelation. Clear and explicit also is the answer of philosophical morality. Punishment that exceeds the offence is unjust, or there is no such thing as justice. Punishment that is neither deterrent, nor preventive, nor reformatory is incompatible with beneficence. So much was already self-evident to Protagoras and Plato. A Christian of Prof. Salmond's type who calls his God just and beneficent must interpret words in a non-natural sense. Would it not be more consonant with human feeling, and as logical, to put another sense on the evangelical eschatology? In one respect it must be explained away. There is quite as good evidence for saying that Christ and the Apostles foretold the end of the world within a few years as that they preached the eternal damnation of the wicked. Eighteen centuries have dissipated the one dream, and should have dissipated the other.

But, says Prof. Salmond, there are alleviations. "The harrowing materialistic ideas of the pains of the lost which were natural to" other "times . . . form no part of the doctrine itself . . . it has to get the benefit of" our "humaner feelings," &c., &c. (p. 662). It cannot get the benefit of its own negation. You began with literalism and you must go on with it. You mentioned as one great blessing of Christianity that it promised a bodily resurrection (p. 584); and you must take along with it the curse of "materialistic" pains for the lost, which, in fact, are exactly what the Gospel announces. If others may not explain away the quantity of future torments, you must not explain away their quality.

It seems as if Dr. Salmond's clear firm brain at last began to reel with the coal-black wine of damnation. Hear how a Professor of Theology interprets his own document:

"Scripture gives no hint that either in ourselves or in our circumstances we shall be in a better position for good in the other world than in this. Christ's word in His great parable on the after-existence, 'If they hear not Moses and the prophets neither will they be persuaded if one rose from the dead,' speaks to the opposite effect" (p. 659).

It is the living who are here spoken of as incorrigible, not the souls in Hades. Prof. Salmond seems to confound being good with doing good. The rich man, who, by the way, seems to have been damned for not being a communist, showed in the midst of torment and despair a disinterested unselfish anxiety for the salvation of his brethren, of which I fear not every communist would be capable, and than which there is no clearer instance of goodness in the whole Bible. To avoid hurting the feelings of some among whom may be personal friends of my own, let me add that in my opinion this parable was never spoken by Christ. I take it to be a Pauline presentation of the substitution of the Gentiles, who before had fed on mere crumbs of doctrine, for the unbelieving Jews in the privileged position of Abraham's family. It means that to preach the Resurrection to the Jews was useless, since the Law and the Prophets had not convinced them that Jesus was the Christ.

ALFRED W. BENN.

Attila, my Attila! A Play. By Michael Field. (Elkin Mathews.)

"LITTLE Honoria, whose yielding 'to the impulse of nature' Gibbon chronicles with such sympathy—a sympathy pregnant with the feelings of our age that was to follow—sought to give freedom to her womanhood by unwomanly audacities; and although the importunate desire 'to be herself' was fair and natural, its perversion was revenged by the blight with which Nature curses. To be vitally stirred, yet go blindly on the way of death; to be urged by Nature, and yet outrage her through very obedience, is a tragedy of tragedies, and one not remote. For Honoria is the New Woman of the fifth century; and to any who shall read her story in these pages the author says, as clearly as a certain Prologue when it declared:

'This man with lantern, dog, and bush of thorn, Presenteth moonshine.'

that 'this play presents irony.'

With these curious words Michael Field concludes the short preface of this play. I must confess my ignorance whether the pitiful story of Honoria has ever been dramatised before; but those to whom Gibbon's account of her is familiar will recognise, I think, the dramatic capacity of the tale. An earlier dramatist would not have shrunk from presenting it as a storm of sexual passion with lightning flashes of poetry: a less daring writer would have softened it down to pure pathos of disappointment with "this dull pomp, the life of kings." Michael Field has just touched it in both kinds, but, in the main, with an eye on times "not remote," shows us new friends with old faces, and ironically exhibits "dreams and foiled desires." The Herodotean definition of the chief of sorrows—πολλὰ φρονέοντα μηδὲν κρᾶν—might, with a change of gender, stand for the life-history of Honoria.

Admirers of Michael Field's work will not find here many of the imaginative touches that adorned "Canute the Great," nor of the depth of feeling that made Long Ago nearly achieve, in places, some part of its daring ambition. But yet, in spite of harsh modernisms—Honoria (p. 12) calls Valentinian "Val," and her lover Eugenius (p. 100) actually says, "I do this for your sake and . . . damn your mother!"—in spite, I say, of things like this, which belong to that modern conception of the New Woman which haunts the writer, there is a subtle skill in the presentment of Honoria not unworthy of Michael Field. Pleasant reading one can hardly call it. The inquisitiveness of Honoria, in her cross-examination of Marsa, in Act i., is certainly unlovely; and her courtship of Eugenius, who is a kind of cowardly and demoralised Joseph with a touch of romance in him, is crude. Infinitely better, to my mind, is her stormy devotion to the unknown Attila, a sort of brutal king of terror who is to emancipate her from the slavery of conventual life at Byzantium or palace etiquette at Ravenna. Of the other characters, Galla Placidia, the cold, unmotherly mother, and Satyrus, the Armenian chamberlain, who takes Honoria's ring and offer of herself to Attila, and is slain for doing so on his return, are far the most interesting.

That there are gems of poetry and forcibly dramatic speeches goes without saying. Of the latter, Honoria's welcome to Eugenius' birthday gift—a bunch of fresh roses—may serve as an example (p. 26). She is alone, and holds up the roses:

"A young man's gift! He gave them with his eyes
As well as with his hands: their odour pierces;
They shine with youth and water-drops and silver;
Their flush goes through me.

If there were no need
To learn the secrets of my womanhood
From matrons and from mothers; if this way
The roses take to open to the sun,
And to enjoy were right! I am beginning
To think all life is simple, and we want
No masters in it, if we will but live.
Only the courage seems impiety
For just a girl to dare to be herself.
The dear old gods were great enough to know
All that we have to give, all that we suffer:
I wish that I had lived in pagan times!
But even now will not youth answer youth?
This is so bold a course that I should like
To pray before I go on it: yet all
The Church has taught me seems to slip away."

There is a natural truth, a beauty, about some of that which goes far to redeem such ugly diction as, e.g., Eugenius' speech on p. 40:

O damn the future! Do you call this love?
Why thrust me forward? I am not your bridegroom,
I never can be; leave me out of count,
If you regard my safety. Tell your mother
Of your condition, but of nothing else;
And she will see you through."

It is not merely that this vulgar slanginess is not literature at all, but that this same Eugenius, poor creature as he is, has a kind of soul, and can say (p. 52):

"Deeper far
Than any treason is the truth I loved;
It is my only truth, just as the leper's
One truth—he once was well."

It appears to me that the "irony," the modern reflection, the attempt to look at the fifth and nineteenth centuries at the same moment, do not suit with the best side of Michael Field's genius. Hence, in this play, that best side only shines out at intervals—as, e.g., at the end of Act ii., where Honoria, sentenced to the conventual life, remembers her mother's words about her lost son (p. 11), and makes a final appeal for herself and the unborn child she is never to see:

"O mother, by the little silver coffin
In which your life is buried—save my child!"

Or again (p. 76), where she pleads with Theodosius to be true to his passion for the Greek girl Athenais:

"Dear Theodosius, do not let it pass,
This glory that is rising on your life,
Rising on hers; for love makes life so whole, Fills up all hollow spaces, enters in
All gaps of solitude: it is the vigil,
The fasting, and the ecstasy in one."

Or again, with a different but most characteristic touch (p. 95):

"I can hear no sound . . .
I know the surface of the earth itself
Is being moved by Attila: I know
There are black ridges on the empire's verge."

Or lastly—though here Michael Field has to contend with the formidable rivalry of Mr. George Meredith, from whose poem this play takes its title—the narrative of the death of Attila (p. 106):

"He did not wake: they cried about the tent
Like wolves and jackals . . . but he did not wake.
At last they caught the tent-skirt in their hands
And entered one by one. The bride was seated,
White, with malicious and abandoned eyes,
Nursing a laugh, her veil wrung round her chin,
And Attila lay prostrate in a mass
Of frozen blood."

It is an ugly picture, powerfully drawn; but it has not the wild and terrible fascination of Mr. Meredith's.

In lesser matters, I venture to note two things as calling for alteration. On p. 76 Honoria appears in the quaint form "Honoraria." On p. 103, the first sentence of the long stage-direction after l. 2 needs to be rewritten.

It has not seemed possible to me to praise this play as a whole, greatly as I admire many parts of it. It is in tragic emotion, not in irony, that Michael Field seems to me to be really strong. The capacity to present a heroine or a hero is weakened in contemplating a mere recurrent type like the New Woman, whose resolution "to be herself" is untouched by any heroic or womanly care as to what that self shall be.

E. D. A. MORSEHEAD.

A Little Tour in America. By the Very Rev. S. Reynolds Hole, Dean of Rochester. (Edward Arnold.)

THIS is eminently a readable book; author and printer have combined to make it so. It is not the first fruit of the Dean's visit to the States, but we like it best. Naturally it is eulogistic. The treatment he received from the Americans, not only in New York but elsewhere, was uniformly gratifying. They were pleased with what he said, and he was pleased with what he saw, and the result was mutual satisfaction.

What took Dean Hole across the Atlantic was as much business as pleasure. Rochester Cathedral was in need of costly repairs, the treasury was empty, and the ordinary sources of supply were exhausted. So, like an earlier financier, he called on the New World to redress the adverse balance in the Old; and, mindful of Browning's lesson of "Date" and "Dabitur," and of the country in which he lived, appeared among his Transatlantic kinsmen not as a mendicant but as an entertainer.

It is no business of ours to inquire what were the pecuniary results of the "Little Tour," but the cheerfulness of the writer leads one to conclude that they were satisfactory. Other Deans in similar difficulties may be tempted to follow Dr. Hole's example; but unless they take with them a like supply of wit, humour, tact, readiness of speech, and breadth of appreciation, they are likely enough to return with empty pockets. It was not to see an English dean but to listen to Dean Hole that people came together.

The "Little Tour" was, in the matter of mileage, a considerable one. It extended as far west as Colorado, and as far south as Virginia and Washington. Of course, Niagara was not left unvisited, and a trip to Toronto enabled the Dean to annex Canada to his field of operations. He assures us that, "so far as his information goes," America does not covet our possessions, "having, like other great land-owners, quite as much on her own hands as she knows how to manage."

New York, as was natural, occupied much of the Dean's time and attention, and he has a good word for nearly everything which he there saw. The tokens of industry and enterprise with which the city abounds filled him with admiration.

"As a thing of beauty, a panorama picturesque to the eye, it cannot be compared with London or Paris, Edinburgh or Oxford; but there is a grander design than architect ever drew; a fairer sight than cloud-capped towers, and gorgeous palaces—man going forth to his work and to his labour until the evening, in obedience to the immutable law of his Maker, 'In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread.'"

This sight, however noble, is not peculiar to New York; and what struck the writer of these remarks more than anything else in the American capital was the eager, anxious look on nearly every face, while the distinctions between wealth and poverty seemed even greater than in the old country. The Dean assures us that "no one is more despised than the American or English millionaire, whose Bible is his banker's book, to whom worship is a bore, sorrow a nuisance, and poverty a crime." This testimony is not borne out by the great leaders of thought in America, who lament that there, as here, society is largely dominated by the many-dollared men. Everything, it must be admitted, is done to prevent "worship" (if that term be allowable) being regarded as "a bore." Indeed, we have never seen out of New York and Chicago such luxurious aids to devotion—carpeted aisles, cushioned pews, &c.—as the Episcopal churches provide. Within their walls "the man in vile raiment" rarely shows himself. But it is only fair to add that much is being done by all sorts of organisations for the poor and suffering, and that there is at least one church in New York—St. George's—which has not been made a house of merchandise.

Of American journalism Dean Hole has a good deal to say. He notes the great improvement in its tone since Charles Dickens held up to ridicule and contempt what he styled the "New York Sewer," the "New York Stabber," and such like specimens of civilised literature; but he is quite aware of the present deficiencies of the public press, and exposes them with much good-humoured banter. Certainly, very many of the journals exhibit deplorable taste in their mode of dealing with the sins and sufferings of humanity, and in some cases the advertising columns are simply disgraceful. An American bishop has not hesitated to speak of the Press generally as "the most venal thing in a country where all things are venal." This, of course, is far too sweeping; and in many, if not in most, of the town newspapers the leading articles are ably and fairly written, and good efforts are made to provide their readers with wholesome literature. The growth of journalism has been rapid. There are now in the United States 1855 daily and 14,077 weekly newspapers. Press work is well paid. On an average, managing-editors receive 5000 dollars a year—about the same as the bishops; but in New York the salaries are upon a much higher scale.

"The editor-in-chief has the same salary as the President of the United States, $50,000 per year; and others receive from $10,000 to $12,000, or more than members of the Cabinet; editorial writers (recurring to the average) $3500, equal to the salary of an Assistant Secretary of State at Washington, and more than the average salary of college presidents; city editors $2500, only a little less than the salary of a Secretary of Legation at one of the leading courts; news editors, copy readers, and space writers $1800, matching the pay of a captain in the army or a junior lieutenant in the navy; and reporters $1200, as much as the average income of those engaged in commerce."

It would, therefore, seem that the "Fourth Estate" is in America both prosperous and lucrative; of its powerful influence, both in stirring and allaying the passion of the nation, we have lately had sufficient evidence.

Dean Hole was fortunate in securing an interview with the President in his visit to Washington. He describes him as "one of the most able, reliable, hard-working rulers of the world. . . . He looks the sort of man who would give all his mind and soul to those questions which seemed to him to be of chief importance to his nation; would study the statistics and weigh the evidence, and then would fearlessly act in accordance with his convictions, whether thwarted by friend or foe."

This estimate has since been confirmed by events which Dean Hole as little foresaw as any of our statesmen, but which add considerably to the value and importance of the book.

It is almost unnecessary to say that even in America the Dean's thoughts turned from time to time to his beloved roses. He devotes a chapter to the interests of what he calls "Rosarians" (he himself might be styled a Rosicrucian), and states, among other things, that roses are produced in the neighbourhood of New York during the winter months more successfully than in any other part of the world. One of the best forcing roses is the American Beauty (known in England as Madame Ferdinand Jamain), besides which La France, Niphetos, Safrano, and other less-known varieties succeed admirably. With the great florists, Mr. May, of New Jersey, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Barry, and others, he exchanged ideas; and states that the happiest hours he spent in America were those in which he was entertained by his brother florists in the Savoy Hotel.

We hope that enough has been said in proof of our opening statement that this volume is eminently readable. We can at least assure our author that he will not need the benevolent defence of the chairman of a Denver meeting, who, after a depressing address, assured the speaker that his discourse was "moving, soothing, and satisfying." When taken to task for having commended a dismal failure, he maintained that he had only stated simple facts, namely:

"that the lecture was 'moving,' because a large proportion of the audience fidgeted in their seats, and several left the room; it was 'soothing' because many fell asleep; and it was 'satisfying' because there was not a single person present who had not had quite enough."

For ourselves, we can only express the hope that these are far from being the last utterances of Dean Hole, and that the favourable impressions derived from his visit to the States may be deepened by repetition.

CHARLES J. ROBINSON.

The Sin-Eater, and Other Tales. By Fiona Macleod. (Edinburgh: Patrick Geddes & Colleagues.)

MISS MACLEOD is the first writer who has tried natively to interpret the Gael, not of the Scottish Highlands, but of the Islands, to Southern readers; and for sheer originality, other qualities apart, her tales in this volume are as remarkable, perhaps, as anything we have had of the kind since Mr. Kipling appeared. They are so original: in fact, they treat of so strange a subject-matter and in so strange a way, that the unregenerate Saxon may find them at first a little difficult. On a further acquaintance, he will find that their local colour, their idiom, their whole method, combine to produce an effect which may be unaccustomed, but is therefore the more irresistible.

"Why," asks Miss Macleod in her dedicatory epistle to Mr. George Meredith—"why do I write these things? It is because I wish to say to you, and to all who may read this book, that in what I have said lies the secret of the Gael. The beauty of the world, the pathos of life, the gloom, the spiritual glamour: it is out of these, the heritage of the Gael, that I have wrought these tales."

This clearly commits the writer to the romantic method that we find preserved in all these tales, though they have here and there a touch of that realism which romance has never been entirely without—Celtic romance especially.

The first of them, "The Sin-Eater," is a capital example in its romantic kind. You feel, in reading it, that the tale-writer has not gone to her subject-matter as a purely disinterested agent. On the contrary, she brings her passionate predilections; instead of being disinterested, she is perfervidly interested; she goes prepared to find the things that count, Celtically speaking, and she finds them—the gloom, the spiritual glamour, and the rest. To-morrow, some New Realist will go over the same ground, and bring back his very different report of things as they really are, and tell us what queer kind of porridge he saw the Achannas eat. But Miss Macleod, being to the manner born, writes from the inside, and not from the outside; is affected through her imagination, and not through her nerves; and is sometimes so carried away by her subject that she forgets how suburban the modern reader is apt to be, and how he likes his sea-lions caged and labelled, and his peat-smoke described in terms of Fleet-street.

Not only does she forget this: she deliberately does all she can to increase the sea terror, the wildness, and the Gaelic savour of her tales. "The Sin-Eater" begins with the wet wind and the sea mist of the western isles; and ends with the wild cry of the man Neil Ross, as he goes down in the "Black Eddy" that rushes between Skerry-Mohr and Skerry-Beag—"An eirig m' anama!" ("In ransom for my soul!") All through it one hears the sea-noises and feels the sea-wind, and the Sin-eater is treated in bold accord with such elemental circumstance. Half man, half myth, he is the scapegoat of the sea. He bears the sins of others, but with no scapegoat's innocence: therein lies the motive which is treated in this tale with so much force. At last he makes his sea-exit on a spar that is like the cross; nay, in the words of Aulay Macneill, who tells his end, "It was the cross he was on. I saw that thing with the fear upon me. Ah, poor drifting wreck that he was. Judas on the Cross: it was his eric."

Still more strange, and from an English point of view more simply and artistically constructed and written, is "The Dan-nan-Ron"—perhaps the finest thing in the book.

"You know what is said in the isles about . . . about this or that man, who is under gheasau—who is spell-bound, . . . and . . . about the seals and . . . ?" says Marcus Achanna to Anne, the heroine of this strange tale.

"They say that seals," he repeated slowly; "they say that seals are men under magic spells."

Here we have suggested a fine dramatic motive at the threshold of an old Gaelic folk-tale; and Miss Macleod uses her opportunity with singular control of the magic machinery of an uncanny subject. The figure of Gloom Achanna, who plays the tune of the Dan-nan-Ron on his feadan (an oaten-pipe or flute), is one not easily forgotten. He lives with unreal reality in one's mind; his wild tunes hold one's ear, though they are described with characteristic Celtic exaggeration by indirection, by colour instead of music, as e.g.:

"Again Gloom took up the feadan, and sent a few cold white notes floating through the hot room, breaking suddenly into the wild, fantastic opening air of the Dan-nan-Ron."

A few pages further, and we come upon Mánus's song, which, with the description that follows, may be given as an instance of Miss Macleod's writing of both verse and prose:

"The tide was dark an' heavy with the burden that it bore,
I heard it talkin', whisperin', upon the weedy shore:
Each wave that stirred the seaweed was like a closing door,
'Tis closing doors they hear at last who hear no more, no more,

My grief,
No more!

"The white sea-waves were wan and grey, its ashy lips before,
The yeast within its ravening mouth was red with streamy gore—
O red seaweed, O red sea-waves, O hollow, baffled roar,
Since one thou hast, O dark dim sea, why callest thou for more,

My grief,
For more?

"In the quiet moonlight the chant, with its long, slow cadences, sung as no other man in the Isles could sing it, sounded sweet and remote beyond words to tell. The glittering shine was upon the water of the haven, and moved in waving lines of fire along the stone ledges. Sometimes a fish rose, and split a ripple of pale gold; or a sea-nettle swam to the surface, and turned its blue or greenish globe of living jelly to the moon dazzle."

There is some excess of mere colour, it may be thought, in all this; but that, too, is very Celtic. And so throughout these tales; the manner of their telling, their idiom, their very mannerisms, only tend to increase their total effect. To quote again from their teller's singular opening epistle from Iona, addressed to him whom she calls "Prince of Celtidom": they have been written "as by one who repeats with curious insistence a haunting, familiar, yet ever wild and remote air, whose obscure meanings he would fain reiterate, interpret." It is only by insisting, as she does, with some romantic excess, on the vivid traits and idioms of the remote Gaelic folk she describes, that she brings home to us their speech, sentiment, and spirit of life, as the true interpreter may. She expressly disavows the documentary method at the start; she is subjective and interpretative to a degree; she is often so much moved by her own subject matter, that Heine's famous confession of overmuch sentiment in his Buch le Grand is apt to recur as one reads. Her tales, then, are not documentary; they reveal their writer's individuality, quite as much as the idiosyncrasy of the island Gael. But, just for this very reason, they provide as original an entertainment as we are likely to find in this lingering century, and they suggest a new romance as among the potential things in the century to come.

ERNEST RHYS.

FRANK AND THE POLISH FRANKISTS.

Frank i Frankisci Polscy (1726—1816).
Monografia Historyczna . . . przez Alexandra Kraushara. (Cracow.)

MR. ALEXANDER KRAUSHAR has long been known for a series of valuable contributions to Polish history, some of which have been already reviewed in the columns of the ACADEMY. By searching the archives of various cities in the course of his travels he has often been able to throw light upon obscure topics. In the present work he traces the career of a remarkable adventurer who founded a religious sect in the latter half of last century. This was the Polish Jew who went by the name of Joseph, Baron von Frank, and founded the sect of the Frankists. Owing to the extraordinary influence which this man possessed over his co-religionists, he persuaded a large number of them to be baptised as Christians, but to all appearance their Christianity was of a superficial character. In consequence of his assumption of something like Messianic functions, wealth speedily flowed into his coffers, so that he was able to hire of a petty German prince a large castle situated at Offenbach-on-the-Main. To this place his votaries flocked. He himself lived in almost regal pomp, and seems to have exercised patriarchal authority over his followers. Thus, on one occasion, when a woman wished to escape from the castle, she was triumphantly brought back by the satellites of Frank, and the prince declared that the police had no jurisdiction within the precincts of Frank's castle.

With the oriental tendencies of his race, we see Frank giving audience to his followers, squatting like a Turk on his divan, and dressed in gorgeous Ottoman array. It is the old story of visions and revelations which has been told from the days of Mohammed to those of Joe Smith. The pretensions of the fanatic increased with his success. He attempted to prove himself of royal birth, and repudiated his humble ancestors, who had been simple Jew pedlars. Whenever he appeared abroad he rode in a splendid carriage, attended by a brilliant band of satellites. His career was an extremely varied one. He had been for some time imprisoned by the Poles at Czenstochowo; but when the place was taken by the Russians during the wars of the partition, our hero was set at liberty. Afterwards we find him having an interview with the Emperor Joseph, who affected the society of mystics.

Frank's career of imposture, however, was to come to an end in 1791, when he died of an apoplectic stroke. The fact that their prophet could not escape the fate of ordinary mortals does not seem to have made any impression upon his votaries. His funeral was on the most splendid scale, and the representation of a crown was carried in the procession.

Frank's wife had pre-deceased him for some time, but we may say that "the business" was carried on by his daughter Eva. From papers printed by Mr. Kraushar we can see, however, that the spell was gradually being broken. The visions were melting into the air. The daughter began to find that the faithful were no longer so lavish in their supplies. She was, in fact, several times on the verge of bankruptcy. Finally, on her death, in 1816, the great establishment of the prophet at Offenbach was broken up. As far as we are aware, the votaries of Frank are now extinct. They left no successors. Mr. Kraushar has taken the trouble to glean what information he could in the town of Offenbach. Some of the older inhabitants have preserved traditions of the father and daughter, and the visit of the Emperor Alexander I. to the latter not long before her death is recorded.

It is well known that the Russian sovereign had a great tendency to mysticism, and during the latter part of his reign was under the influence of Mme. Krüdener, who died in Russia while on a journey to visit some colonies of Jews in the south of that country. The last Frankist (who survived till 1860) appears to have been a certain Franciszek Wiktor Zaleski, who, on account of his constantly wearing a green cloak, went among the inhabitants under the name of der Grüne. He appears to have written some plays; but to all questions addressed to him about Baron Frank he either observed silence or gave an evasive answer. It has been surmised that he had a hand in the redaction of some of the prophetic utterances of Frank. The castle which the Frankists once occupied has become a hotel. The princeling who rented it to the impostor, a certain Fürst von Isenburg, having joined Napoleon in his hostility to the Germans, and become a member of the Confederacy of the Rhine, at the Congress of Vienna was deprived of his possessions.

By the aid of many documents, which now see the light for the first time, Mr. Kraushar is able to reconstruct the history of this remarkable delusion. We sometimes find him in the notes challenging the statements of the late Dr. Graetz in his History of the Jews. We cannot wonder that the record of Frank and his doings has been neglected by Christian and Jewish authors alike, the former because they probably looked upon the conversion of him and his followers as more or less a sham; the latter because they despised them as renegades.

It only remains to add that Mr. Kraushar's work appears from the press of Messrs. Gebethner & Co., from which so many excellent publications have issued. It is furnished with two portraits of Frank and one of his famous daughter Eva, besides a facsimile. Moreover, there is the picture of the skull of Frank, which is in private hands, having been extracted from his grave when many bodies were removed from the old to the new cemetery at Offenbach. We must confess to a distaste for this ghoul-like interest in the dead. Let these poor reliques of mortality have their proper place in the grave. Even to this day the skull of Kochanowski, the famous Polish poet of the sixteenth century, is above ground. We ourselves have seen it in a museum.

We are afraid that Mr. Kraushar's work being in Polish will prevent its being read by many in England. We can only say that it is a source of pleasure to us to call attention to this carefully prepared book, and, indeed, to the quantity of excellent historical work which the Poles have been producing for some time. Their language, which boasts the culture of centuries, is in a very flourishing condition. The general reader who may become acquainted with Mr. Kraushar's book will only see in it another page added to the depressing records of human mendacity and credulity. But, in days when Theosophy can count its numerous votaries, we cannot venture to look with contempt upon the dreams and prophetic utterances of a Polish Jew of the last century.

When Wheat is Green. By Jos. Wilton. Pseudonym Library. (Fisher Unwin.)

If for nothing else, the reading public are indebted to Mr. R. W. Frazer for a beautiful and eminently apt title—although juxtaposed it would have been still more pleasing to the ear. When I say that the seven stories contained in the book are worthy of place under this general heading, I say a great deal. It was no easy task, in the first place, to saturate the book with a sense of the almost endless sunshine, the parched earth, the thirst of man and beast, the monsoons and the hot winds of India. More difficult still was it to unfold in a few brief recitals some of the strange secrets of these Eastern peoples: to make the reader feel not only that they still cherish their rites, their superstitions, their hatreds, and their loves, but that these things are as the blood in the veins of the Brahman, the Hindu, and the Parsi—that they throb with every breath he draws, and cease to have power only when he dies. But in order that a book of this kind may prove acceptable, it is needful to convey much more than this. The ancient civilisation of India must be present as a background; the fierce hatreds that divide tribe from tribe, caste from caste; the shame of having to submit to a foreign yoke, and a hundred other elusive elements must be suggested. In a word, unless a book such as Mr. Frazer's has atmosphere, it must be written a failure. The author, however, has succeeded in permeating every page of Silent Gods and Sun-Sleeped Lands with the spirit of India. The gods, no whisper of whose voice is heard by the ordinary European, are made to speak, their followers to obey; the undying hatreds are unmasked, the old rites are shown to live even now; and all this with a vividness and a force which can spring only out of an intimate and scholarly knowledge of history and of modern conditions in the East. Mr. Frazer sets the superstition of "The Tailless Tiger" in an imaginative episode which enhances greatly its appeal; he weaves a subtle spell, too, around other strange prejudices and beliefs in the weird tales of "The Cry from the River" and "The Wail of the Woman"; and the tragic death of Vasantasēnā, the Pearl of the Temple, at the hands of the chief priest, is told with insight and skill.

"The Cloud Messenger," an adaptation from the well-known Sanskrit poem, Megha Dūta, by Kalidasa, probably written about 56 B.C., reveals a wonder-world of exquisite imagery and untold richness: more than this, it has a profound philosophical significance, as, in greater or lesser degree, have all these tales. This rendering, though in prose, seems to have caught much more of the Eastern spirit than did the earlier translation, in verse, of H. H. Wilson. Silent Gods and Sun-Sleeped Lands, in the main, is so good, that a word of criticism is all the more necessary. The punctuation throughout requires revision; indeed, the sense is frequently obscured, and the pleasure of reading materially lessened in consequence. Nor does Mr. Frazer appreciate the value of the brief sentence to brace the reader's thought and stimulate his attention; the very few short sentences which do occur in the book come as a great relief. The tendency, here intentional, to a prodigal employment of adjectives—to over-elaboration, in fact—also detracts from the effect of this fine effort. Reserve, and a scrupulous heed to matters in themselves small, but whose cumulative effect is considerable, are necessary to every work of art. The illustrations of Mr. A. D. McCormick have caught much of the weird charm of the text.

The intellectual and moral development that takes place during the plastic years of childhood has an ever-fresh interest, not for fathers and mothers only, but for every one who remembers something of the joys and sorrows, the hopes and fears of youth, and how pathetically optimistic is the early outlook on life. "Rita," in her latest book, brings to the study of Master Wilberforce and his little companion much intellectual sympathy, and she has elected wisely to treat the subject with simplicity and directness. They are no ordinary children whose doings are here chronicled. The hero, born a "small, beefy specimen of humanity," soon shows that he has a perfect passion for inquiring into first causes, a passion which becomes emphasised from the night when he brings to the parental roof a stray gipsy child called Mehetabel. The manner in which these two young folk grow up side by side, naively discussing all sorts of questions from original sin to the utility of book-learning, the period of their separation, the renewal of their intimacy, and the knowledge, flashing on them in a moment, that they are something more to one another than pleasant companions—this and much more is told by "Rita" with considerable force and no little insight into the mysterious emotions of child-life. Master Wilberforce's father is the somewhat hackneyed man of science as delineated in fiction, but the mother is pleasantly portrayed. The book is written for grown up, rather than for young children.

Mr. Geoffrey Mortimer's second novel is on very different lines from Tales from the Western Moors. The scenes, for the most part, are laid in London, and the life depicted is that of the less well-to-do music-hall artistes: in fact, if the term music-hall be substituted for the first word of the title,

Like Stars that Fall, a true idea is gained of the drift of the story. Although the author in the opening pages of the book lacks facility of expression, he soon loses himself in his subject; and the vicissitudes inseparable from the side of Bohemian life with which he deals, wherein representatives of nearly every class of society are to be found, are drawn firmly and with knowledge. Indeed, sometimes the realistic method is carried to an extreme. The generous virtues and the more apparent vices of music-hall Bohemia are treated with skill; and the story, notwithstanding one or two conventional situations, is vigorously told. The Rev. Wilfred Kimpson, incumbent of St. Winifred's, City, whose large heart makes him beloved by the music-hall fraternity, bears a marked resemblance to a popular clergyman. Mr. Mortimer is a careful writer; and he should be on his guard against phrases such as "The beer bemused Joshua," and collocations like "A horrid dilemma."

The lady who writes under the pseudonym of Leslie Keith proves once more that she possesses not only a keen observation, but the power to reconstruct a pleasant story out of what she sees and hears. The central figure in For Love of Prue is a type of woman seldom encountered in fiction: indeed, in life she is a rare, although not a non-existent figure. Prue is actuated only by her sense of justice and her warm heart when she persists in showering kindness after kindness on the embittered nephew of her dead husband; she is sublimely unconscious that Frederick Chillingworth, who begins by distrusting and hating her, grows to love her as he has never loved before. She is equally unconscious of the heavy burden she lays upon him when, having rescued his drunken wife, from whom he had been separated, she urges him to return to that woman, and to try and make her happy; but, without so much as a word of reproach, Frederick Chillingworth does this thing for love of Prue. The second love-story, of Rosa Bower and John Campbell, to which equal if not greater prominence is given, has an accidental and not a vital connexion with the history of Prue; and, although it affords an opportunity for a fresh and breezy description of life on the isle of Scarra, the author has made a mistake in treating the two subjects in a single volume. What otherwise would be a good book leaves an unsatisfactory and blurred impression on the mind.

The Education of Antonia is treated by Miss F. Emily Phillips in a bulky volume of nearly five hundred pages. If it be a first book, it is full of promise, for that the author has literary ability is abundantly evident. The conversations, invariably bright, sometimes almost brilliant, are too long and numerous—many of them might be omitted without detriment either to the delineations of the characters or to the development of the plot. Certain obvious faults of construction mar really good effects; some sentences are involved without the excuse of adequate motive, while it would be well if the writer avoided the use of strange words, such as "plenishing" and "soufulness." When Miss Phillips has learned of what vital importance it is to discard the unessential for the essential, we may expect a good novel from her pen. Notwithstanding the faults named, the interest in Antonia's career is thoroughly well sustained.

In Kincaid's Widow Sarah Tytler adds another to her already numerous successes. Readers who demand variety of events and rapidly changing scenes will be disappointed, for the author treats her subject in the leisurely, robust way well-fitted to the period of which she speaks. The incidents, few in point of number, take place at or near the Castle of Wedderburn, in a remote part of the Lothians, towards the end of the seventeenth century. The proud and arbitrary Lord Wedderburn, the "Liddy Mellins," his two elder daughters who inherit much of his asperity but little of his grandeur, charming little Ailie, and Kincaid's widow herself (the original of whom is to be found in Fountainhall's Historical Notices)—all are conceived and drawn in a manner worthy of high praise.

"Can a man who was born to go on the wrong side of the post—bred and trained to go on the wrong side, and has always taken a pride in going on the wrong side—have any hope at all of ever going straight?"

This is the problem which Mr. E. L. Prescott sets himself to solve in The Apotheosis of Mr. Tyravley. In spite of many rebuffs, and the machinations of a stagey individual named John Paget, the hero of this story is enabled finally to give an affirmative answer to the question. The reader, if he is to enjoy the book, must not be too exigent about probabilities, and must permit himself to enter into the sentimental world here depicted. Jim Naylor, the coostermonger, blunt, kind-hearted Dr. MacAdam, speak and act in a life-like way; the tone of the book is healthy throughout; but the scene wherein the rich uncle takes Mr. Tyravley to his heart, and transfers much of his wealth to that reformed individual, might with advantage have been stripped of some of its melodramatic trappings.

In a brief preface to Woman's Folly, Mr. Edmund Gosse remarks that the author of that book, Gemma Ferruggia, "leaves George Egerton and Madame Sarah Grand panting far behind." In a sense, doubtless, this is true; but if the "mere man," as Mr. Gosse designated himself, is to be pulverised by efforts such as the one under consideration; if the movement towards a juster recognition of the claims of woman depend on books of the type of Woman's Folly, so much the worse for man and for woman. That the story is well and, in places, even powerfully written, cannot be denied; but the characters are sadly lacking in imaginative justice towards man, and the atmosphere is heavy with miasma. As typical of a phase of nineteenth-century unrest, Woman's Folly is interesting; and that is all. Miss Helen Zimmern, so far as can be judged, has fulfilled admirably the office of interpreter.

Why Jos. Wilton calls his book, which forms the fifty-first volume of the Pseudonym Library, When Wheat is Green, is a difficult question to answer. Several vivid pictures of rural life are to be found in the little work; but the author refuses to be bound by any principles of continuity—he commences one story and cheerfully passes to another without a hint as to the meaning of this rapid transition—and hence the book as a whole is unsatisfactory. Jos. Wilton, too, has an annoying way of expecting the reader to know intuitively what character is speaking, and sometimes this is no easy task.

FRANK RINDER.

SOME BOOKS ON THE COLONIES.

The Gold Mines of the Rand. Being a Description of the Mining Industry of Witwatersrand, South African Republic. By Frederick H. Hatch and J. A. Chalmers. (Macmillans.) This is a highly technical work, which ought to be in the hands of a professional engineer. We feel it would be presumptuous to make any comments on the greater part of the book, except to say that to a lay mind it seems to be well and carefully composed, and that the plans which illustrate the system of mining in the Witwatersrand goldfields are clear and delicately drawn. These deposits, we are told, were first discovered by a man named Arnold in 1885; by the end of that year mining had begun. During the succeeding year the outcrop of the conglomerate beds was traced and found to be auriferous for many miles, many farms were proclaimed as public diggings, and Johannesburg was founded. In the year 1887 coal was discovered at Boksburg, in the near neighbourhood of the diggings, which led to the opening of several collieries. This discovery is of immense importance to the success of mining operations in what is called the Rand goldfields. Some tables furnished by the authors show the vast expansion in the revenue of the Transvaal since the discovery and development of the goldfields. In 1884 the revenue of that State was £161,595; ten years later (1894), it had risen to £2,247,728. The quantity of gold produced is stated to amount to over one-fifth of the total production of the world in 1894, the money value of the total gold production of the Transvaal for that year having amounted to the sum of £7,800,000. The authors complain of the hindrances thrown in the way of the miners by the exactions of the Boer Government, and there can be no doubt that there was ample room for complaint. We have yet to see how much the gold-miners will gain from the changes which must follow Dr. Jameson's raid; but in all speculations on the future the astuteness and tenacity of purpose of the Boers must be taken into account.

The Sister Dominions. Through Canada to Australia by the New Imperial Highway. By James Francis Hogan, M.P. (Ward & Downey.) The new "imperial highway" is the Canadian Pacific Railway and the line of steamers that Mr. James Huddart has established between Vancouver and Sydney. The Government of the Dominion of Canada has guaranteed Mr. Huddart a subsidy of £150,000 per annum for ten years to enable him to establish a fast line of steamers on the Atlantic as well as the Pacific, so that when this line is in working order there will be a swift mail and passenger service between the mother country and her Australian possessions, without touching an inch of foreign soil, or losing for an instant its distinctively and essentially Imperial stamp or character. Mr. Hogan, who takes the reader through Canada to Honolulu, Fiji, Sydney, and Melbourne, has produced a pleasant book, easily written and full of information. He heads a chapter on Melbourne "A City of Fallen Greatness"; and unless there be some exaggeration, the decay of that capital is indeed deplorable:

"The collapse observable on every side is both painful and phenomenal. Stagnation, depression, despair, are the three words that sum up the sadly altered situation in Melbourne. The loss of population is something enormous. An exodus of sixty thousand souls during the past eighteen months is officially acknowledged, but this estimate falls considerably short of the reality. Judging from the immense number of closed shops and untenanted houses that I witnessed during a systematic tour of the suburbs, some figure between 100,000 and 150,000 would more correctly represent the astounding decrease of the population of Melbourne—that is to say, practically a third of the inhabitants of the metropolitan area has disappeared. Suburban streets that I remembered as crowded and busy lines of industry are now simply long rows of silent, unoccupied, and dilapidated shops. . . . Tenants are everywhere masters of the situation. Rent is a mere courtesy to owners, who are glad to accept whatever tenants care to offer. In most of the outlying suburbs rent is a disestablished institution, owners being only too happy to have respectable people occupying houses in the capacity of caretakers until the arrival of better times, for they know the fate that has overtaken a host of the unoccupied houses of Melbourne—wreck, mutilation, and the carrying away of everything portable."

Mr. Hogan's account of the land boom is profitable reading, and he tells us that there is not a single man to be found in Melbourne who has profited by it. The corruption of the Government of Victoria has, however, benefited, or, perhaps we should say, created a large class whose interest it is to resist any financial reform—namely, public employes. A careful calculation shows that, on the average, one person out of every twenty in Victoria is in receipt of Government money; and so thoroughly and systematically organised is the large body of public servants that they are practically the masters while nominally servants, and undisguisedly control the fate of Ministers and Ministries. He tells us that at the last general election the Government of Sir James Patterson was defeated and overthrown avowedly by the votes and political influence of the public servants, because Sir James had made stern and rigorous retrenchment in the Civil Service a cardinal feature of his policy. Mr. Hogan gives a final thrust at his city of fallen greatness by writing "Melbourne is a shocking example of protection run mad."

British Guiana and its Resources. By the Author of "Sardinia and its Resources." (George Philip & Son.) This little book of one hundred pages is very slight, but, so far as it goes, businesslike. Although the author is not hopeless as to the future of sugar, he undoubtedly considers gold-mining to be the greatest and most promising of the industries of British Guiana. He gives an official table showing the great increase in the production of gold since the year 1884, when only 250 ounces were obtained. From this small beginning the production increased so rapidly that in 1893 the Government return gives 138,527 ounces as the weight of gold produced. In no country are the mining laws so favourable to prospectors as in British Guiana: on the other hand, the climate is very unhealthy and labour a difficulty. We are glad to learn that some check has been placed by law on the destruction of orchids.

"Among the by-products of the forests may be classed orchids; they are of infinite varieties, and owing to their being ruthlessly and indiscriminately taken, a licence to collect orchids has been imposed, involving an annual payment of 100 dollars and a royalty of 20 cents. for every orchid exported."

The principal use of a book such as the present one is to inspire readers with a desire for further information. A rough map is provided, which fails to include the greater part of the territory now in dispute between British Guiana and Venezuela!

AT the meeting of the Library Assistants' Association, to be held on Wednesday next, at the rooms of the Chemical Society, Burlington House, Mr. Cyril Davenport, of the British Museum, will deliver a lecture, with limelight illustrations, on "English Bookbindings." The chair will be taken by Dr. Richard Garnett.

IT has been decided to purchase for the Hampstead Public Libraries the library of the late Prof. Henry Morley, who lived long in Hampstead and accomplished much of his literary work in the parish. It is intended to keep the collection intact so far as possible, under the name of the Morley Memorial Library. As might be expected, it contains a fine selection of standard authors, both English and foreign, and is rich in first editions of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It also includes a good Shakspeare collection. It consists altogether of about 8000 volumes; and the valuation price is £806, towards which £100 has been contributed by subscription.

NEXT Wednesday, Messrs. Sotheby will be engaged in selling a small collection of Americana, which includes not a few rarities. For example, here will be found no less than four editions of the Poesi Novamente Retrovati, one of which has an autograph of a brother of Vespuccio inserted; a copy of Eliot's Indian Bible, with a few leaves unfortunately missing; many books and a few MSS. relating to the dialects of the aborigines; and early examples of the printing presses of Mexico, Lima, Guatemala, &c. We learn from the catalogue that the first book printed in Venezuela was Descripcion Exacta de la Provincia de Venezuela, by Joseph Luis de Cisneros (Valencia-Nueva, 1764).

PRESIDENT MONROE's message of 1823, containing the statement of the "Monroe Doctrine," has been published in full among the Old South Leaflets, being No. 58 of this series of historical documents. The leaflet, like the rest, contains notes and references to the literature of the subject.

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT have issued this week a cheap edition of John Halifax, Gentleman, with the name of the author—for the first time, we believe—on the title-page. Considering the prodigious popularity of this novel, ever since its first appearance in 1857, it certainly seems surprising that it has hitherto not been obtainable at a lower price than 5s.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

AT a special meeting of Convocation of London University, held on Tuesday, the following resolution, which was recommended by the annual committee, was carried by the decisive majority of 466 votes to 240:

"That this house desires the early introduction into Parliament of a Bill for the reconstitution of the University similar to that introduced last year by Lord Playfair, but with an inserted clause securing to the Senate, to Convocation, and to other bodies affected the right of appeal to the Privy Council on any of the provisions which may hereafter be settled by the Statutory Commission."

THE grace founding a lectureship in English at Cambridge will come up for approval in the Senate on Thursday next. In the course of the discussion last Saturday, Prof. Skeat stated that he had recently received a further £100, raising the total endowment to nearly £1400; and that the Merchant Taylors' Company had promised two hundred guineas, to be paid when the lectureship was established.

LORD ACTON has been compelled by indisposition to postpone his first lecture at Cambridge until next Monday. The subject of his course this term is again "The French Revolution."

AT the annual meeting of the Cambridge Philological Society, held on Thursday of this week, the following paper was to be read by Prof. Skeat: "Why the a in 'Cambridge' is pronounced like the a in 'came,' with a Note on the Derivation of 'Cam' from the Name of the Town." At the same meeting a presentation was to be made to Prof. Cowell.

FROM the first annual report of the managers of the Hort Memorial Fund, we learn that the capital amounts to about £1000, and that during last year £46 was received from subscriptions and donations. Grants of money were made to the total amount of £55, to three students. Of these, Mr. H. St. J. Thackeray visited Rome last Easter for the purpose of assisting the editors of the "Larger Cambridge Septuagint" in the examination and collation of MSS.; Mr. H. S. Cronin has continued his collation of the great Coislin Octateuch, at Paris; and Mr. H. N. Bate (of Trinity College, Oxford) has collated afresh the Codex Claromontanus of the Latin Irenaeus, at Berlin.

IN connexion with the teachers' training syndicate at Cambridge, Mr. H. Courthope Bowen will begin next Wednesday a course of twelve lectures on "The History of Education."

THE governors of Manchester New College, Oxford, have accepted a gift of £5000 from Mr. Henry Tate, of London, to be devoted to "special and emphatic instruction" in the theory and practice of preaching. The donor says he has "long entertained an earnest conviction of the exceeding importance of this portion of the training of students for the ministry in Unitarian and other Free Churches."

THE late Miss Aytoun, of St. Andrews, the last surviving sister of Prof. W. E. Aytoun, has bequeathed the sum of £2500 to the University of Edinburgh to found an Aytoun scholarship in English literature.

PROF. BALKHILL is delivering a short course of lectures at University College on "The Progress of Legal Studies in England, Scotland, and France during the Eighteenth Century."

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THERE are two remarkable papers in the January number of the Antiquary. The one by Mr. A. W. Buckland, on "Necklaces in Relation to Prehistoric Commerce," is too much condensed; but notwithstanding this unavoidable defect it contains a mass of evidence which will be, at least in its present relations, new to almost every one. Beads, even more than coins, passed from place to place, and from continent to continent. They could be restrung and arranged in different forms as fashions changed or they fell into new hands. The passages relating to amber are noteworthy. Though there are disquisitions on this substance in many books of reference, English and foreign, we do not think all that is known regarding it has ever been gathered together in one place. Has the amber which is found occasionally on the eastern coast of this island been washed across from the Baltic, or do the drift-beds of our own coasts produce it? The men who sell curiosities at the Yorkshire watering-places profess to have no doubt of its being an English product. Mr. J. Lewis André's paper on "The Use of the Holy Scriptures in Faith-Healing and Superstition" treats with a curious section of folklore. As the writer shows, it is very old. We imagine, however that it was stimulated by the Reformation. Superstitions are not easily killed, but they readily transfer themselves from one object to another. In medieval times there were several other books which claimed extreme reverence. On the change of religion, it is probable that all the floating superstitions which had connected themselves with the service-books of the old Church became attached to the Bible. Mr. André alludes to the practice of saying the Lord's Prayer backwards. This was certainly done by schoolboys within the last fifty years. We do not suppose that this form of the black art has yet fallen into disuse, though now it is probably a profane jest rather than a serious endeavour to invoke the powers of evil. Dream books are casually mentioned. There is still a large sale for such rubbish. No form of folk-lore now existing has more evil consequences than the belief in the statements made in these noxious publications.

THE ACADEMIE FRANÇAISE.

Paris: Jan. 17, 1896.

M. JULES LEMAITRE's reception speech in honour of his predecessor, Victor Duruy, may be considered one of the best of his series of "Portraits Contemporains." It was a clever, witty, highly finished piece of literary composition, read in a clear and harmonious voice, interrupted every now and again by a discreet murmur of applause from the delighted audience.

The task was not an easy one, for there was nothing very striking in Duruy's character. Of humble origin (he was the son of an artist-workman at the Gobelins), a hard-working, plodding man, he gradually made his way from a simple professorship to the highest position in the University.

"C'était," said M. Lemaître, "un professeur grave, excellent, sans gestes, un peu lent, fait pour la toge, et qui attachait autant par son sérieux même que par le don qu'il avait de voir et de peindre; profondément respectueux de sa tâche et qui n'ignorait point—je cite ses expressions—que 'l'esprit de l'enfant est un livre où le maître écrit des paroles dont plusieurs ne s'effaceront pas.'"

In 1862, while on a tour of inspection in the provinces, he was suddenly summoned to Paris by the Emperor and appointed Minister of Public Instruction. He saw Napoleon III., who simply said to him: "Ça ira bien." "Et ça alla très bien," added M. Lemaître, with a smile. Alluding to the new Minister's outspoken frankness in his relations with Napoleon III., he drew the following striking portrait of that sovereign:

"L'Empereur souffrait ces franchises et n'en pensait—ou n'en songeait pas moins; car il me paraît avoir songé sa vie plus qu'il ne l'a vécue. L'épopée de son oncle, l'étrangeté merveilleuse de sa propre aventure, lui étaient une sorte d'opium, d'autant mieux qu'il avait été extraordinairement servi par les circonstances, qu'on avait beaucoup agi pour lui, et qu'il avait passé d'une extrémité de fortune à l'autre sans être proprement un homme d'action. Les yeux toujours à demi clos, il ruminait confusément l'affranchissement des nationalités, l'établissement d'une démocratie un peu socialiste et pourtant césarienne et, par là, l'achèvement de la Révolution française: grande dessein dont les moyens d'exécution se précisaient mal dans son imagination de doux fataliste qui, ébloui par un destin prodigieux dont il était l'heureux jouet et dont il se croyait le héros, comptait indolamment sur la vertu de son étoile. Il fut de ceux dont on peut dire qu'ils sont meilleurs qu'une partie de leurs actes, parce que ces actes furent rarement siens ou que rarement il y fut tout entier. Il vécut ainsi dans une brume de rêve—qui, vers le fin, s'ensanglanta."

In the course of his speech M. Lemaître quoted passages from a letter addressed by Duruy to the Emperor on the education of women, in which he alludes to the opposition of the Clerical party to his Liberal ideas:

"Nous ne devons pas oublier," quoted M. Lemaître, "que les femmes sont mères deux fois, par l'enfantement et par l'éducation; songeons donc à organiser aussi l'éducation des filles, car une partie de nos embarras actuels provient de ce que nous avons laissé cette éducation aux mains de gens... enfin, de gens qui n'avaient pas toute la confiance de M. Duruy."

Now in the printed form of the speech which is presented to a chosen few of the audience I found that M. Duruy's words were "... de gens qui ne sont ni de leur temps ni de leur pays." The witty reticence of M. Lemaître was due, I suppose to a feeling of delicacy, a wish not to ruffle the feelings of the "reactionary" members of the Académie. The incident was very characteristic.

M. Lemaître drew an admirable portrait of M. Duruy as historian, reformer, and Minister of Public Instruction. With great eloquence he described how after his overthrow, through the intrigues of the Clerical party, he quietly resumed his historical labours, and after the fall of the Empire lived a retired life at Villeneuve-Saint-George, amid the respect of all.

"De telles figures," added M. Lemaître, "sont bonnes à regarder. Elles rappellent aux âmes inquiètes que, entre les croyances confessionnelles et le doute ou la négation, il reste à la conscience des refuges; qu'il est toute une vénérable tradition de postulate moraux, sur qui l'on peut dire que, depuis les temps historiques, ont vécu tous les hommes de bien: car ceux mêmes d'entre eux qui n'y croyaient pas ont agi comme s'ils y croyaient, et ceux qui croyaient à quelque chose de plus croyaient donc à cela aussi. Le probe historien Victor Duruy fut un homme excellemment représentatif de cette tradition, qui fait tout le prix de la longue existence humaine. Il dit quelque part que les Grecs de la décadence 'manquaient de ces fermes assises si nécessaires pour porter honorablement la vie.' Ces assises séculaires, il les eut en lui, profondes; et vous savez si, en effet, il porta la vie honorablement."

M. Gréard's reply was not at all so grave as might have been expected. On the contrary, his discourse was familiar in tone and tempered with gentle irony as he described the various aspects of M. Lemaître's talent as poet, critic, paradoxical chronicler, and successful playwright. Much amusement was caused by the following passage, in which he referred to one of M. Lemaître's "Billets du matin" in the Figaro:

"Vous souvient-il du jour, où dans un billet du matin à votre petite cousine vous disiez en parlant de l'Académie: 'Cette boîte là!' Une boîte!"

Le mot doit vous sembler un peu vil aujourd'hui. Mais il y avait, dans ce billet des premiers jours de mai tant de verve printanière! Je lui pardonnerais bien d'autres, disait un jour, à propos de je ne sais quelle échappée, votre directeur d'Ecole Normale, Émile Bersot. C'est le caractère de vos moindres écrits que vous y apparaissez dans votre naturel. Tour à tour pétillante d'esprit ou voilée par la réflexion, votre œuvre vous peint, et l'on peut s'y fier, pourvu que l'on vous prenne, comme vous vous donnez, dans la bonne foi de votre complexité—pourvu surtout qu'on sache jouir de ce que vous êtes aujourd'hui et attendre ce que vous serez demain."

M. Gréard concluded in the most flattering terms:

"... Que ne sommes-nous pas en droit d'espérer de vous le jour où votre talent prendra dans le plein de l'humanité contemporaine la matière d'une œuvre qui la reconforte et l'élève? Vous avez l'esprit assoupli à toutes les idées, le cœur ouvert à tous les sentiments; vous avez la jeunesse, le don, le succès: rien ne vous manque pour répondre à notre attente. 'Je vous aime assez pour vous aimer mieux,' dit à ses enfants le père de L'Age d'or. Laissez-moi emprunter le mot, Monsieur, en l'appropriant à la sincérité de nos sentiments: vous nous avez donné trop de sujet de vous admirer pour que nous ne souhaitions pas de vous admirer encore davantage."

Cecil Nicholson.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GUTENBERG—CORRIGENDA.

20, Collington-place, S.W.: Jan. 2, 1896.

In a previous letter I mentioned the fact that the first undisputed evidence we have of Gutenberg's connexion with Strasburg is dated in 1442 (I ought to have said 1441), and is forthcoming in a document, numbered "8" by Mr. Hessels, which is mentioned as early as 1720 by Schellhorn in his Amoenitates Literariae. According to this document a knight named Luthold von Ramstein, and "Johannes, styled Gensefleisch, otherwise called Gutenberg of Mainz," both living at Strasburg, became sureties for a certain Johannes Karle, armiger, for 100 guilders, borrowed from the Chapter of St. Thomas at 5 per cent.

In a second document, marked "10" by Hessels, and dated November 17, 1442, "Johannes (styled Gensefleisch), otherwise Gutenberg of Mainz," and Martin Brechter, a citizen of Strasburg, obtained a loan of eighty guilders from the Chapter of St. Thomas at Strasburg, for which they pledge their salvation ("Seligkeit") and Gutenberg's inheritance from Johannes, a secular judge at Mainz, who was called Leheymer, and who is described as Gutenberg's avunculus.

Now avunculus means mother's brother, and can mean nothing else; and if so, it suggests a very considerable puzzle, since Gutenberg's mother is always referred to under the name of Gutenberg, and it can only mean either that she was a widow when she came across Gensefleisch, the father of Gutenberg the printer, or else she merely took the name of Gutenberg from the house in which she lived, her real name having been Leheymer. This last view is perhaps supported by the fact that she always calls herself Else zu Gutenberg, and not von Gutenberg, as did all the members of the older Gutenberg stock, which was now, so far as we know, extinct. We can, at all events, hardly doubt that her maiden name was Leheymer.

Gutenberg's uncle, the judge, is no doubt the same Leheymer before whom his mother appeared, in the suit to which I referred in a former letter.

Let us now turn to another and more famous document, about which a very great deal has been written—namely, the record of the lawsuit of 1455. It seems to me that every biographer of Gutenberg, and every historian of the origin of printing, has gone sadly wrong in regard to this document. They have treated it as if it were the judgment of the court, or in some way the final decision of the judges, while it seems to me to be nothing of the kind. It is, in fact, the record of what lawyers call an interlocutory proceeding: namely, the finding not by the judge, but by a notary of certain facts; and, far from concluding the lawsuit, it would seem, from an appeal made by Peter Schoeffer to a certain Gutenberg, judge at Mainz, at the beginning of the next century, that the lawsuit was then still unsettled. There is, so far as I know, no evidence whatever that Gutenberg was ruined by this lawsuit; no evidence that he returned to Fust the type and other materials which he had used.

This does away with a great deal of unnecessary rhetoric, in the course of which Fust has been very unfairly used; and it does away with some inferences regarding the early history of printing.

One more word by way of criticism. In a note to his work on the History of Printing, Fischer suggests as probable that—since Gutenberg is mentioned among those who had apparently been implicated in some political disturbance, and were absent from home in consequence, in 1430—he may have been born about 1397 or 1398. This is a mere guess of Fischer; but his mere conjecture is apparently adopted as a fact by Dr. Heffner in the Archiv des Hist. Vereins von Unterfranken (xiv. 1. 168, &c.), who speaks of Gutenberg as having actually been born in 1397.

For this I do not know of any evidence whatever. The first reference to him known to me is that in the document dated January 16, 1430, and printed at length in my last letter; the second reference is in a document dated, according to Dr. Hessels, March 28, 1430, describing the reconciliation effected between the town of Mainz and a number of expatriated citizens through the intervention of the Archbishop Conrad III. In this document Henrich zu Gutenberg is mentioned as "nit intendig," that is, as not being in Mainz. It has generally been argued that this means he was then living at Strasburg, for which there is no authority. It is more probable that he was living at Eltvil; for in 1434 we find him making some provision for his brother Friele, who was then living at Eltvil.

The next documents, which I hold to be genuine, are those above referred to, and dated respectively in 1441 and 1442.

I should like in another letter to point out how these facts affect the story of the origin of printing as generally told.

HENRY H. HOWORTH.

THE SIN-EATER IN WALES.

Highbury, Gloucester: Jan. 12, 1896.

One difficulty in arguing with Mr. J. P. Owen arises from the fact that he declines to stick to the point at issue: nay, after being expressly told, he still seems to be unaware what the point is. Let me tell him once more. The question is, whether sin-eating was in effect a Welsh funeral practice. I have shown that the evidence does not rest only on Aubrey's authority, but that customs apparently identical are described by other writers in English and Welsh. And I repeat that Mr. Owen has not seriously attempted to controvert my position. Instead, he wanders away to wedding customs, to the Brig o' Dread, to St. Elian's Well, to pennillion-singing, and to fifty other irrelevant matters. He is so full of throwing "a few sidelights" that he forgets to focus them on the object, and leaves us to grope our way as best we can to his meaning. And then he takes credit that he has "not thrust his own prejudices and prepossessions into this controversy."

What he appears to mean is that the practices (which he admits took place) were "relics of Popery"—in other words, that they were Christian, and not heathen practices. What then? Does he attempt to distinguish them from the practice, with which we set out, described by Aubrey? Not at all. He contents himself with surmises as to how Mr. Moggridge came by his information, complaints that I have ignored Christian rites, and "simple astonishment"—poor fellow!—at finding the custom in North Wales "described as that of sin-eating shorn of the ritual words." When I try to recall him to the question, he gives a long and interesting quotation from "The State, Civil and Ecclesiastical, of the County of Lancaster, about the year 1590," and says: "It would be insulting the intelligence and abusing the patience of the readers of the ACADEMY to lay before them any more evidence of that kind." I agree all the more heartily because he gives us no hint how the evidence applies to Wales.

In answer to Mr. Owen's complaint that I had broken off a quotation from Robert Jones at a certain point, I adduced in my last letter reasons to show that the subject of the Diodles ended where I ended my quotation. All he replies is: "Dogmatism as to the Diodles having nothing to do with the dul coffa is surely premature." Surely it is—but then neither Robert Jones nor I had referred to the dul coffa, or memorial knell, which is dragged in by Mr. Owen himself from the Golewad Cymru, for what purpose he has yet to show.

Mr. Owen accuses me of omitting a portion of M. Jorevin's account of a funeral at Shrewsbury. I quoted all that was given by Brand and Ellis; for, unfortunately, I had no more access to the original than Mr. Owen himself. But what difference to the argument the rest of the sentence, as he now gives it, would make, he carefully avoids informing us. He seems to think the blessed word "portentous" settles everything—as well it may where "simple astonishment" is reckoned a valid argument.

Lastly, in wandering round the subject, he comes upon my reference to Strabo, and complains that in The Legend of Perseus I have misinterpreted the geographer's expressions. This is an excellent sample of Mr. Owen's "red herring" style of controversy. It may be a very heinous crime to misinterpret Strabo, and I may or may not have been guilty of it. I could easily defend myself if it were necessary to do so here. But my reference to Strabo in the columns of the ACADEMY was a purely incidental one; and I am not going to gratify my friend by running away from the historical question of the prevalence of sin-eating, and practices identical therewith, in Wales and the Marches to a discussion of cannibalism at large, or even of Irish cannibalism. To discuss these subjects with such a disputant as Mr. Owen would be very entertaining; but it would occupy the rest of my natural life.

"PRIAR," "BRIAR," "CHOIR."

Burleigh House, Sydenham Hill: Jan. 12, 1896.

It is well known that these words are considered to be irregular, all of them in pronunciation, and the first two, at any rate, in form. Prof. Skeat, in his Principles of English Etymology (second series, p. 94), says:

"Lastly, I have to mention A.F. and M.E. frere, which should have become frier, but has actually been developed into frier, just as A.S. brir, M.E. brere, is now brier, and M.E. quer, quere, is now quire, though spelt choir."

Now, it has occurred to me that this form, frier, may have been introduced into England from the South-West of France. At first sight, no doubt, this would seem to be impossible; and once already I have been twitted by Mr. Mayhew for broaching (as he supposed) a similar notion in the ACADEMY. But it should be borne in mind that at one period of our history we were constantly making expeditions and incursions into the West and South-West of France, over parts of which, indeed, we have held sovereignty; so that many Anglo-Normans and English (and also Normans) must at times have sojourned there for years, and must not only have left traces there of their sojourn (see P.S.), but must also have brought home such traces with them. And, if so, is it so very unreasonable to suppose that the pronunciation, and consequently the spelling, of certain English words borrowed from French may have become affected thereby, and have acquired a certain resemblance to Provençal words? Now, even at the present time, the Provençal equivalent of the French frère is fraire (see Mistral), and the ai in this is pronounced as we pronounce ai in Greek. This I know to be a fact, for last spring and summer I spent three months at Nice, and during my stay I took lessons in the Niçois dialect* and had frequent opportunities for hearing paire, maire, fraire (= père, mère, frère) pronounced by a native. The ai is, of course, a little broader than the i of frier as pronounced by educated Englishmen: still the difference is not very great.

But brier and choir cannot be explained in this way, unless, indeed, they came into use subsequently to frier, and had their pronunciation, and in the case of brier the spelling, modified in accordance with frier. With regard to brier, however, as within the last thirty or forty years, the French bruyère has been turned into brier (in brier-root pipes)—although there is not the slightest connexion in meaning (see N. & Q., fourth series, xii. 445, where it was first recorded)—it is certainly possible that the M.E. brere may have become brier and brier through confusion with the M.F. forms of bruyère—viz., bruyère and especially brière (Litttré and Godefroy).

As for choir, if not imitated from frier, there is, perhaps, sufficient resemblance between its M.E. forms—viz., quer and quere, and the M.E. forms of quire (= 24 sheets of paper)—namely, quaier (Skeat, op. cit. 113) and quaer (Stratmann), and the M.E. forms of choir—namely, quer and quere—to have rendered confusion possible.

F. CHANCE.

P.S.—I have spent several months at different times in the French town of Angoulême, which was at one time in the possession of the English, and I noticed there and in the neighbourhood four things which reminded me of their occupation. (1) An unusual proportion of light-haired, light-complexioned people, especially children, which was the more remarkable as the inhabitants generally are quite as dark as much farther south. (2) The parceling out of the land into small fields with hedges, and with trees growing in the fields, and sometimes in the hedges, as in England. This is certainly very unusual in France. (3) The milk-pails suspended from a kind of yoke worn round the neck, precisely as in England. A Parisian lady told me she had never seen it elsewhere in France. (4) In the chief hotel at Angoulême I found the counterpanes on the beds made of that white material with minute cotton tufts (I do not know the technical name) which used to be so common in England, and is still often seen, but which I had never before seen in France. I do not say, of course, that 2, 3, and 4 were all or wholly borrowed from England, or that we borrowed them from that part of France: still it seems probable that some interchange took place. Mr. Parker, in his Introduction to Gothic Architecture (fourth edition, p. 218), is of opinion that our possessions on that side of France exercised "great influence upon art in England"; and if upon art, why not also upon other things, including that part of our language borrowed from France? There is also a certain resemblance in form between the patois of Normandy and Provençal which must strike everybody who pays any attention to the two dialects, and has attracted the attention of certain French writers. And, though it never seems to have occurred to these writers that Normans and Provençals were ever brought into contact, yet I think it ought to be borne in mind that such contact must have taken place, as English armies, when warring in France, certainly took with them Norman contingents.

THE GLAGOLITIC ALPHABET.

THE Glagolitic was the ancient liturgical alphabet used by the Croats, Illyrians, and other Western Slavs who acknowledged the Roman obedience, and have now, in consequence, adopted the Roman alphabet; whereas the other Slavonic alphabet, commonly called the Cyrillic, was the script of the Bulgarians, Servians, Wallachians, and those Eastern Slavs who adhered to the orthodox communion. The modern Russian alphabet is a slightly modified form of the Cyrillic. The two scripts were closely allied, several letters being common to both, while in both alphabets the names of the letters were identical.

As to the origin of the Cyrillic alphabet there is no difficulty. Of the thirty-eight original letters, twenty-four are identical with the ninth-century Greek uncials, others are variants or ligatures derived from these uncials, while half a dozen are uncouth forms borrowed from the mysterious Glagolitic alphabet, whose source has been the subject of prolonged discussion. It was believed by Jacob Grimm and others to have been derived from certain hypothetical "Slavonic runes," of whose existence there is no proof. In a paper, Ueber den Ursprung des glagolitischen Alphabets, published in 1880, the present writer put forward the theory, which has met with wide acceptance, that the two Slavonic alphabets merely represent the two current forms of Byzantine writing, the Cyrillic being the uncial book-hand, while the Glagolitic was derived from the Greek cursives and cursive ligatures of the seventh century, afterwards uncialised, so as to fit them for liturgical use. The two alphabets would thus bear much the same relation to each other as the English Court-hand did to the Book-hand used before the invention of printing.

Dr. Abicht now comes forward with a new theory, contending that the alphabet used by Cyril for his Slavonic translation of the Psalms and Gospels was not the so-called Cyrillic, but the Glagolitic, of which he was himself the inventor, basing his invention on an obscure and difficult alphabet, probably of Iranian origin, styled Grusinian by the Russians, and used by the Iberians or Georgians south of the Caucasus. Dr. Abicht admits that there is no reason to suppose that Cyril had any knowledge of Georgian speech; but he conjectures that in some way he may have come across the letters of their alphabet, out of which, by arbitrary modifications of all sorts, he produced an alphabet which in the West, where the Georgian script was unknown, might pass for a wholly new alphabet invented by himself. The resemblance between the Georgian and Glagolitic letters being slight, Dr. Abicht supposes that Cyril introduced unaccountable and needless alterations, turning some letters upside down, turning others on their sides, adding or discarding loops or hooks, and occasionally borrowing letters from the Hebrew. With such licence as Dr. Abicht allows himself, it would be possible to establish the derivation of almost any alphabet from almost any other.

Such arbitrary invention or modification of alphabetic symbols as Dr. Abicht's theory demands was constantly called into requisition in the pre-scientific stage of palaeography in order to explain difficult or anomalous forms; but the history of alphabets, if it teaches us anything, teaches us that new alphabetic forms are as certainly the result of evolution as are linguistic changes, or modifications in the forms of animals or plants.

More than thirty years ago, Ritschl laid down the law that scientific palaeography must rest on the assumption that alphabetic changes are never accidental or arbitrary, as was formerly believed, but are the result of evolution taking place in accordance with definite laws. Dr. Abicht's treatise, which exhibits considerable erudition and much wasted ingenuity, must therefore be pronounced to be fundamentally unscientific. It is more reasonable to believe that, as the Cyrillic script was evolved out of the uncial Byzantine Book-hand by an almost unconscious adaptation to the phonetic needs of Slavonic speech, so, in all probability, the earlier Glagolitic script was not a strange alphabet purloined from an obscure tribe in the Caucasus, but that it was evolved by natural processes out of another form of Byzantine writing, the ligatured cursive script of a somewhat earlier period. Cyril's reform was therefore merely the substitution of the legible uncial forms for the deformed and illegible cursive, a change much of the same kind as when our early printers rejected the uncouth black letter, and returned to the earlier Caroline minuscule, the so-called "Roman type," of which the black letter was merely a barbarous deformation. Dr. Abicht's contention is much the same as would be an attempt to derive black letter or German from the Square Hebrew, which it chiefly resembles in its ugliness.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FOUR PHOENICIAN INSCRIPTIONS FROM CYPRUS.

II.

Magdalen College, Oxford: Jan. 20, 1896.

The fourth inscription is the longest and most important. It is cut on a magnificent stele of Pentelic marble, perfectly preserved. Mr. Myres has presented it to the British Museum, where it is now to be seen in the Cyprus room (No. 31). The fortunate excavator has good reason to be proud of such a treasure. It was found in the same place as Nos. 1 and 2, in the necropolis of Kition, outside old Larnaka. I give a transliteration and rendering:

מצבת חז אש ימנא ארש רב סרסרם לאבי
לפרסי
רב סרסרם בן ארש רב סרסרם בן מנחם
רב סרסרם
בן משל רב סרסרם בן פריס רב סרסרם ולאמי
לשמוזבל בת בעלרם בן מלכיתן בן עזר
רב חן
ענם על משכב נחרתם לעלם

"This is the pillar which Ariah, chief of the Stewards (?), erected to his father, to Parsi, chief of the Stewards (?), son of Ariah, chief of the Stewards (?), son of Menahem, chief of the Stewards (?), son of Mashal, chief of the Stewards (?), son of Parsi, chief of the Stewards (?); and to his mother, to Sham-zabal, daughter of Beal-ram, son of Milk-jathan, son of 'Azar, chief of the Treasurers, over the bed of their rest for ever."

Some of the proper names occur elsewhere on the Phoenician inscriptions. Ariah is a common name, C. I. S. 132, 4. 193, 1-2. 196, 3, &c.; Menahem, C. I. S. 87, 3. 103 b, &c.; Mashal occurs in the compound name Melqarth-Mashal, Carth. 130, 4-5; Baal-ram, C. I. S. 88, 2. 89, 2, 90, 1; Milk-jathan occurs frequently as the name of a king of Citium and Idalion; 'Azar is also found, Carth. 27, 5-6. 26, 2. 3-4; the rest of the names are not met with on other inscriptions, so far as I know. The expression על משכב נחרתם "upon their bed of rest," may be exactly paralleled by C. I. S. 46, 2. But the chief interest of this inscription lies in the two phrases רב סרסרם and רב חזענם. As regards the meaning of the first, we may be assisted by the use of the word sursur in Arabic—"intelligent, skilful, one who manages a property well." This is probably not a pure Arabic word; Fraenkel (Aram. Fremdwörter in Arab., p. 186) conjectures that it is a loan-word from the Aramaic סרסור, and quotes in illustration Peniqta, ed. Buber, fol. 45<sup>a</sup>. 3. From the Arabic usage we may suppose that רב סרסרם means "chief of the stewards or commissioners," public officers who administered the property of the state or of the temple. In Rabbinic Hebrew סרסור is frequently found in the sense of "mediator" (see Levy, s.v.); but the Arabic usage seems to be most suggestive.

The meaning of the other expression, רב חזענם, can be determined with greater probability. In Arabic the root hasana means "to lay up, to store, to guard"; the noun formed from it, hazinun, is used of "one who guards property"; in the Quran, 39, 73 the plural is used for the keepers or guardians of Paradise. It seems, therefore, likely enough that this may be the explanation of the word on the inscription: "chief of the treasurers," or custodians of public property.

The form חזענם, which, after repeated examination of the stone, I feel convinced is the true reading, exhibits a noticeable feature. The redundant h is here a vowel-letter and represents long a. This is a usage not uncommon in the Neo-Punic inscriptions—e.g., נערר for נדר Carth. 186, 2. 368, 3. נדרע C. I. S. 207, 3. 232, 3. פנ=פנ C. I. S. 188, 1 (cf. Schröder, Die Phön. Sprache, p. 91f.). But all these examples are from late Carthaginian inscriptions from North Africa; it is certainly curious to find h used as a vowel-letter on a Cyprian inscription which may be dated about 250 B.C. We must suppose that it is an isolated example, and wait for further discoveries.

G. A. COOKE.

A CONJECTURE IN PROPERTIUS 3.17.33.

Trinity College, Dublin: Jan. 19, 1896.

"Mollia Diraene pulsabant tympana Thebae."

It is strange how the tight-stretched tambourine can be called mollis: to translate "effeminate" jars with the context. I am pretty confident that Propertius wrote Tmolia. Mount Tmolus was the source of the Bacchic worship, and apparently the place where the tympanum was invented. Eur. Bacch. 154: Τρόλιον χρυσόρου χλιδῆ μάλα τρετὸν τῶν Διόνυσου βαρυβέρβητον ἐν τρυμάνων. Add Bacch. 55, 65, 482. Tmolius occurs in both Virgil and Ovid. Anyone familiar with the habit of omitting one of two similar consonants, so characteristic of the MS. N, will not wonder at Tmolia being taken to be molia, and corrected to mollia. Perhaps some of your readers can inform me whether this emendation has been anticipated?

ARTHUR PALMER.

P.S.—Tmolius in Georg. 2.98 is corrupted in several MSS. to Mollus and Mollus.

These relics, which were described in the ACADEMY on the occasion of their exhibition at Bristol in 1893, include portraits, MSS., printed books, and objects of personal interest, such as the chair in which Jenner died. For the most part, they have been handed down as heirlooms through members of the family. Subscriptions are received at the Old Bank, Bristol.

M. MARCEL BERTRAND, son of M. Joseph Bertrand, has been elected a member of the Académie des Sciences, in the place of M. Pasteur.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

PHILOLOGICAL.—(Friday, Jan. 10.)

PROF. A. S. NAPIER in the chair.—Mr. Henry Bradley, joint editor of the society's New English Dictionary, made his yearly report on his progress in the F words. Last January copy to fe had gone to press, now foliated had been sent; 128 pages have been printed in the year, the last proof begins with fogger. All proofs have been read by Drs. Fitzedward, Hall, and Fowler, Mr. H. H. Gibbs (Lord Aldenham), and Mr. W. H. Stevenson. Other helpers are named in the printed parts. The F words vary much, from modern scientific terms to some of the oldest English and Romanic words, besides several onomatopoeic formations of arbitrary coinage. Initial f has attracted makers of imitative and contemptuous words—flip, flap, flop; fish, flash, flush; flick, flack, fluck; flim-flam; flip-flap, &c. Of special words, foist has not the nauseous origin sometimes attributed to it, but is perhaps analogous to the dialectal German fäusten, "to get into one's fist." It was first used in the treatise on Dice Play of 1533, and meant the holding in hand of a false die to introduce at any point of the game; the false die was "foisted" in; all the known senses flow from this, and are parallel to those of cog, though cog means also to "take in by flattery." Fogger in "pettifogger of the law" (circa. 1550), and in trade a huckster, pedlar, middleman, is probably from the Fuggers, the great merchants of Augsburg in the fifteenth-sixteenth century. The word has passed into many languages, and was referred by Diez to this source. To fog, "to cheat, swindle," is a back-formation from fogger, as fog, "mist," is from the older foggy, applied to (1) land covered with fog, coarse grass or moss, (2) soft, spongy, puffy flesh, (3) stout, fleshy persons. "Fat air" in Shakespeare, pinguis aer, is thick, dark air, murky, unwholesome sky. Mr. Bradley dealt also with flamfow, flakin, flim, flimsy (perhaps from flin), fatter, flicker, flippant (1. nimble of wing or foot; 2. voluble of tongue; 3. saucy, conceited), flow, fibbertigibbet, flare, and the ghost-word flingall, a kestral (said to come from "fly in gale"), which is Topsell's misprint for German stingall, the name of the bird.—A vote of thanks to Mr. Bradley for his services to the Dictionary was passed unanimously; and for disyllable and disyllabic in the Dictionary, the meeting recommended that only one s in each word should be used.—Notice was given that Mr. Gollancz's paper on February 7 would be on "The Song of Wado."

METEOROLOGICAL.—(Annual Meeting, Wednesday, Jan. 15.)

R. INWARDS, Esq., president, in the chair.—The report of the council showed that the society was in a satisfactory condition, thirty-four new fellows having been elected during the year.—Mr. Inwards devoted his presidential address to the subject of "Meteorological Observatories," which he illustrated with numerous lantern slides. After describing some ancient observatories, including the Nilometers, and the Tower of the Winds at Athens, he gave an account of national observatories, of which the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, was taken as a type. High level observatories were next described, of which that on Mont Blanc was taken as a type. Special reference was also made to the observatory on the Sonnblick, the high level observatory at Arequipa, in the Andes, and that on Ben Nevis. An account was next given of tower observatories, together with some of the results obtained from the Eiffel Tower at Paris. Mr. Inwards, in concluding, said: "One can figure to oneself a tower piercing the air from any of the elevated table-lands of this country, Salisbury Plain, the Stray at Harrogate, or the downs between Guildford and Dorking, and from which the most interesting results could not fail to accrue. It is the opinion of M. Vallot, no mean authority, that a high tower is for air-observing purposes equivalent to a mountain station of ten times the altitude; and this is plain when one considers that any mountain must act as an obstacle which thrusts upward the strata of the atmosphere into a form almost like its own, so that some of the effects are very little different from those observed below, while a tower like the Eiffel Tower thrusts itself in the air without obstructing its movements. It is the boast of the Royal Meteorological Society that it is gradually covering the country with a network of private observing stations, and is collecting together, for the enlightenment of all future time, a mass of accurate knowledge on the subject of the changes in our atmosphere, its varying moods, its beating pulses, its calms and its convulsions, so that when the philosopher is born who is destined to unravel all its mysteries he will have the tools and instruments ready to his hand."—Mr. E. Mawley was elected president for the ensuing year.

HISTORICAL.—(Thursday, Jan. 16.)

SIR M. E. GRANT DUFF, president, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. S. H. D. Holton on "Richard the Redeless," being an estimate of the character of Richard II., and a review of the causes of his deposition derived from original sources of information. Mr. H. E. Malden and Mr. Hubert Hall took part in the discussion.—Mr. Holton's paper was ordered to be printed in the next volume of the society's Transactions.

FINE ART.

OLD MASTERS AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

II.

THE few old Netherlandish and German works in Gallery No. IV. are of high quality, and in this respect present an agreeable contrast to their Italian neighbours. Of peculiar interest is the large panel "Our Lord bidding Farewell to His Mother" (National Gallery of Ireland), ascribed to Hugo Van der Goes. The subject is one very rare in Northern art, and not common, indeed, even among the Italian painters. We know as yet too little of the manner and the works of Van der Goes, one of the greatest masters produced by the Netherlands in the fifteenth century, to pronounce definitively for or against this attribution, which is a possible but not exactly a convincing one. With the style of the great altar-piece "The Adoration of the Shepherds," in the Gallery of the Santa Maria Nuova Hospital at Florence, that of the "Christ," now at the Academy, does not show a similarity amounting to identity. The latter is a singularly personal and pathetic conception due to a Netherlander of the fifteenth century, in its last quarter, who is strong enough to stand by himself, but may possibly be Van der Goes in another phase of his practice. There has been some acquiescence in ascribing to the same master the magnificent "St. Victor and Donor," in the Glasgow Corporation Gallery; but here again we are on uncertain ground. Perhaps the work of all others which shows the most real affinity to the Portinari altarpiece at Florence is that one of the famous Netherlandish panels, originally in the Church of the Holy Trinity at Edinburgh, afterwards at Hampton Court, and now at Holyrood, which shows Sir Edward Broule, Provost of Trinity College, Edinburgh, kneeling in prayer, with St. Cecilia playing on an organ in the background.

Another fine specimen of fifteenth-century art is the "St. John with the Lamb" (Mr. Percy Macquoid) ascribed to Patinir. Fresh, bright, and clear is the green prospect, and charming in its sincerity the adult figure of St. John which it enfames. Neither the type of the figure nor the brushwork of the landscape is that which we associate with the name of Patinir. The hand is not unfamiliar, yet it cannot at present be coupled with a name. Something in the style and chord of colour recalls that curious picture in the Alte Pinakothek of Munich, "The Legend of the Hermits, St. Anthony and St. Paul"; but of this resemblance it would be unsafe to make too much. The brightly coloured little "Virgin and Child" (Mr. Charles Butler) is rightly placed in that group of sixteenth-century works to which we must still, by way of description, give the name of Jan Mostaert.

If the famous "Sir Thomas More" of Holbein (Mr. Edward Huth) is not absolutely his finest, it is certainly his most moving portrait. Though never coldly, he is often calmly objective, preferring to let his sitters reveal themselves without obvious aid from the painter. Here—as in the "Sir Bryan Tuke," of which original versions belong both to the Munich Gallery and to the Duke of Westminster—he allows the warmth of his sympathy and his interpretative power to come to the surface. It is not only because we know the tragic fate which overtook the Chancellor a few years later, that we see foreboding in the gentle yet fearless countenance. The tragedy is there already foreshadowed in startling fashion, yet without pose or affectation on the part of the sitter or the artist. Painted in 1527, during Holbein's first visit to England, like the "Archbishop Warham" of the Louvre, it shows a breadth and ease, a simple grandeur of conception, which the Bâle master did not always equal even in the masterpieces of his later years. It is curious to note how the SS collar is painted in flat gold shaded—his more usual manner—while in the ring on the finger the gold is rendered in the Netherlandish fashion, with yellow impasto. The "Sir Thomas More" was in the collection of Charles I., and would appear to have been then of slightly larger dimensions. This is confirmed by the fine copy from the brush of Rubens, which is No. 1609 in the Prado Gallery of Madrid. The latter is an inch or two higher than Mr. Huth's picture, and shows a little more than the half figure here visible. The "Portrait of a Young Man," formerly at Blenheim Palace as a Holbein, but now No. 633A at the Berlin Gallery as a Joos Van Cleve, was another work of the same class, which Rubens copied, or rather translated, in his free, vigorous fashion. His rendering of this bust-portrait by the elder master is No. 786 in the Alte Pinakothek of Munich.

The great full-length "Portrait of a Genoese Lady" (Duke of Abercorn) is one of the most sumptuous examples of Van Dyck's Italian style to be found in England, though by no means one of the most interesting. The golden splendours of the colour recalls the young Antwerp master's Venetian predecessors; but he has hardly succeeded in giving a personal image of the pretty Genoese gentlewoman, who appears somewhat overwhelmed by her gorgeous apparel and surroundings. The charm which distinguishes Van Dyck's "Lady of the Balbi Family" at Dorchester House is here conspicuously wanting. The very curious "Virgin and Child, with St. Catherine" (Duke of Westminster), which belongs to the master's Italo-Flamish style, covered the period when he established himself again in Flanders, half metamorphosed by his frequentation of the Venetians, yet acknowledging once more the influence of Rubens. Generally Van Dyck contented himself with the effort to assimilate the qualities of his great Italian prototypes; here he stands forth actually an imitator, an eclectic. The blonde "St. Catherine" is a Venetian type of mundane beauty, such as Titian, Palma, the Bonifazi and Paris Bordone delighted to group with their "Holy Families." The composition, apart from this subsidiary figure, has, on the other hand, been borrowed from Correggio, whose Campori "Madonna and Child" in the Real Galleria Estense of Modena has been the model. The long neck and affectedly poised head of the Madonna have, moreover, a distinct flavour of another master of the same school, Parmegianino. It would be interesting to learn whether any drawing from the little picture of Allegri is to be found in Van Dyck's Italian Sketch-Book.

The Royal Academy seemingly makes it a rule, when there is an important special show going on hard by, to bring forward a certain number of pictures of the same class. Thus last year the great Gallery No. II. showed a good many Venetian canvases; and now we find here half a dozen Spanish pictures, which should be looked at in connexion with the extended series comprised in the Spanish Exhibition at the New Gallery. The "Portrait of an Infanta" (Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan) is the picture from the Lyne-Stephens collection, which was last summer at Christie's. We have here the Infanta Maria Theresa, who afterwards espoused her first cousin, Louis XIV. Though this full-length is by no means the most masterly or the most engaging of Velasquez's court portraits, it has special value as the only representative of its particular type. The flesh-painting is somewhat hard, and there is some queer drawing in the chair upon which the pet spaniel of the princess has curled itself up. The picture asserts itself chiefly in virtue of the vigour of its tonality, and the superb painting of the stiff, ugly, court costume. Another portrait of the princess, this time in her wedding garments, is to be found in the great tapestry designed by the French master, Le Brun, to commemorate the espousals. Here the Spanish royalties and courtiers look, by the side of the gay, be-ribboned French contingent, like inhabitants not only of another land but of another planet. If only Velasquez, who was present not as pintor de cámara, but as one of the court chamberlains, had been tempted to commemorate the scene from his own point of view! A youthful Roi Soleil, painted in all the bravery of his wedding garments by Don Diego, would have had an interest altogether unique. The "Don Balthasar Carlos" (Lady Wallace) is so transformed by the darkening of its surfaces, through discolouration of the varnish and, it may be, other causes, that it has acquired a kind of Rembrandtesque chiaroscuro. Enough is still visible, however, to prove that we are in the presence of an undoubted original throughout from the hand of the master. The head, which is the only portion of the canvas distinctly visible, is painted with an exquisite subtlety, with an unwonted charm. Nowhere else does the young prince, whose premature death was so great a misfortune for Spain, bear himself more royally than here, or with so simple a grace. Murillo is seen in his most virile and unaffected mood in the large canvas "Faith Triumphant" (Mr. Alexander Henderson), which looks much better here than it did in the Lyne-Stephens collection. The upturned faces of the male worshippers—all of them doubtless portraits—are especially fine. The pendant lunette, showing an "Immaculate Conception," is in the Long Gallery of the Louvre. There is much of Murillo's manner in the pathetic and characteristically Spanish "St. Sebastian" (Mr. W. H. Pollen); yet an examination of the picture does not leave behind the absolute conviction that he is himself answerable for it.

In discussing the group of French painters, whose works constitute one of the special features of the display, we almost unconsciously separate from them Claude Lorrain and Antoine Watteau—not only because the one springs from Lorraine and the other from French Flanders, but for the reason that, somehow or other, a longer and more complete intimacy with their works has brought them nearer to our hearts. The two great canvases, "The Sermon on the Mount" and "The Worship of the Golden Calf" (Duke of Westminster), are not exactly in the front rank in which we should place Lord Wantage's incomparable "Enchanted Castle," or the pictures at Bridgewater House and Longford Castle. The composition of the former piece is naïve to (and beyond) the verge of eccentricity, and both suffer much from the mechanical figures, by some collaborator, with which they are peopled. Still, the distances are of exquisite quality, and the state of preservation appears to be in both instances unusually satisfactory. To acquire, or, as the case may be, to strengthen, the conviction that Watteau is the one painter-poet of an age which revelled in sparkling elegance, but did not recognise true imagination when it presented itself in an unfamiliar form, we need not go much beyond these two well-known canvases of his, "A Ball under a Colonnade" and "Repat in the Wood," generously lent to the Academy by the trustees of Dulwich College. The former, better known as "Les Plaisirs du Bal," has suffered from darkening and disintegration, as only too many Watteaus have suffered. But who knows whether an added glamour has not been lent to this particular scene by the ravages of time, aggravated by the carelessness of the painter? Less important, less celebrated, but certainly not less exquisite in its way, is the "Repat in the Wood," the design of which recalls the much larger "Rendez-vous de Chasse" at Hartford House. The scene is here one of luminous twilight, in which the hues of the many-coloured satin costumes glow like jewels. If one must criticise, for fear of succumbing too unreservedly to Watteau's charm—a fascination in the true sense of the word—it may be pointed out that here, as in a good many other instances, he is seen using up in a new combination certain types first created independently in those life-sketches which were his chief delight. It is not when a Pater is next to a Watteau—as the "Pleasure-Barge" (Mr. A. de Rothschild) is to the "Plaisirs du Bal"—that one can feel kind to it; and this composition is too manifest an imitation by the dainty, empty pupil of the genial master to command respectful attention. He is to be preferred in those sparkling little pieces of which the silver-grey tonality constitutes his chief claim to originality; and it is only a very relative originality after all. For some reason or another Lancret is absent from the group of the eighteenth-century "small masters," though his pictures are not uncommon in England. Greuze, in his more bourgeois and less insincere mood, is well represented by the pretty little piece "À Vous," with some citizens of amiable aspect drinking toasts. We cannot leave to this master the capital portrait contributed by Lord Rosebery as that of Robespierre. The colour is warmer, the shadows are less grey, and the brush more openly displays its workings, than in his most characteristic works. Is the portrait really that of the Jacobin Dictator? At first one would be prepared to answer this question confidently in the affirmative; but some doubt arises when a comparison is made with the engraved portraits, which show certain differences in the construction of the brow and chin. Of Mme. Vigée Le Brun's peculiar, passionless elegance but a very imperfect idea can be formed from the so-called "Portrait of the Painter" (Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan), which can hardly represent the same self-conscious enchantress whom the pictures of the Louvre and the Uffizi have made so familiar to us. Of Prud'hon, whose manner has been perpetuated in our day by M. Henner, a painter who possesses his charm of execution without his inventiveness or variety, we have a not very interesting "Triomphe de Bonaparte," and an exquisite study of a naked boy, "Le Zéphyr." Jacques-Louis David is here only pour la forme; and the "Odalisque" of Ingres (Mr. Constantine Ionides), though better in colour than many things from the same hand, is not so admirable in drawing as should have been everything for which the uncompromising pontiff of design made himself responsible. It is a difficult task to defend the famous "Marino Faliero" of Delacroix from the critic who should undertake in cold blood to lay bare its many faults, voluntary and involuntary; and yet it must be defended. The composition, with its great vacant space in the centre, is disconcerting; the figure-drawing, almost as wilfully eccentric as in the "Faust" and "Hamlet" lithographs, repels those to whom the romantic art of the master is unfamiliar. And yet the subject is presented with an extraordinary passion and suggestiveness through the colour, and the colour alone. Delacroix is not only a splendid colourist, but, what is much more rare, a colourist of expression. His harmonies, whether they flame up in sinister splendour, or smoulder intentionally muted and depressed, are the very essence of his subject, as they are of his own turbulent soul. It is infinitely curious to find Rossetti, in the newly published "Letters," praising Ingres, Hippolyte Flandrin, Ary Scheffer, and Robert-Fleury—even finding something that is amiable and generous to say about the frigid Delacroix—yet unable to place himself in sympathy with an art which was genuinely romantic like his own, though it was certainly at the opposite pole of romanticism. "Delacroix," says our post-painter " (except in two pictures, which show a kind of savage genius), is a perfect beast, though almost worshipped here" (Paris). Reading this, and remembering what Delacroix himself said about the "ambitious peasants" of Jean-François Millet, one finds some comfort in the thought that, after all, there is a little place on this earth for the art-critic.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. GEORGE AITCHISON, professor of architecture in the Royal Academy, will on Monday next begin a course of six lectures on "Romanesque Architecture."

On Monday afternoon, at the London Institution, Prof. W. B. Richmond will deliver a lecture on "The Decoration of St. Paul's—how it came about."

An exhibition of water-colour drawings by Mr. Charles Sainton, entitled "The Real and the Ideal," will open next week at the Fine Art Society's, in New Bond-street.

In view of the Burns centenary, to be celebrated on the poet's birthday in the hundredth year after his death, a statuette will be published by J. and M. L. Tregaskis, of High Holborn. It has been modelled by Mr. Paul K. Montford, gold medallist of the Royal Academy. The figure is seventeen inches in height, and it may be obtained in either of two forms—in bronze or in terra-cotta. The number of copies is limited, and a guarantee is given that every one will pass through the hands of the sculptor himself.

Mr. HENRY ROBERTSON has been elected an associate of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers.

Messrs. SEELEY & Co. announce a re-issue of R. L. Stevenson's Picturesque Notes on Edinburgh, originally published in 1878, with an entirely new set of illustrations by Mr. T. Hamilton Crawford, of the Royal Scottish Water Colour Society. These illustrations will consist of eight copper plates, four of which are etchings, and more than fifty other engravings in tint and line. The book will be ready for issue in the course of February.

The remaining portion of the Queen's London has been prepared in advance of the serial publication; and the complete volume, containing nearly 400 illustrations, will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co. at the end of February.

The series of illustrated papers on the monumental brasses of Nottinghamshire, which are appearing in Notes and Derby Notes and Queries, will be issued in book form shortly after completion. The writers are the Rev. H. Hardley Field and Mr. J. Potter Briscoe, the editor of the magazine.

We hear that Dr. Lucio Mariani has written a paper on the Vases of Kamares—quite independently of that on the same subject by Mr. J. L. Myres—which will be published in the next issue of the Monumenti Antichi of the Accademia dei Lincei at Rome.

THE STAGE.

THE "ANTIGONE" AT ATHENS.

THE desire to present to the visitors who are expected to flock to Athens, for the forthcoming Olympian games, a representation of the old drama on its native soil has resulted in the selection of the "Antigone" of Sophocles. The actors are to be the students of the "Society for Teaching the Archaic Greek Drama." Takelaris will compose and arrange the music for the chorus, and the Odeion of Herodas—with the consent of M. Delianini, who represents the Government—will be the theatre.

Opposition and disunion as to the choice of play and site, and every other arrangement, is, however, not absent. The time is short, quite too short, for students altogether unprepared. The Odeion is objected to because it is the offspring of the Roman, not the Hellenic age: consequently a play acted there cannot give a true idea of the Greek drama in the time of Sophocles. The choice of the play as being the best fitted for the occasion is also called in question.

There are so many real difficulties that it is futile at the eleventh hour to raise more. Throughout all one cannot help feeling how much needed is the presence of an organiser like Dr. Gray, of Bradfield, among these dissentients upon ways and means; and one looks forward with some dread to the final result. Happily the discordant sounds of the English pronunciation of Greek, the only blemish upon the perfection of the Bradfield representations, will be absent; but that will not be an unmitigated advantage in the opinion of the foreign guests, to whom it is especially desired to show the Greek drama in the place of its birth.

STAGE NOTES.

ANOTHER stage veteran, who will long be honourably remembered, died not many days ago. This was Mrs. Stephens—"Grannie" Stephens she was called affectionately—and she died at her pleasant house in a remote South London suburb, at the ripe age of four-and-eighty. It is nine years, or thereabouts, since Mrs. Stephens retired from the stage; but to the last all her faculties were retained, and the charming old lady was wont to be present at notable performances that interested her. As a representative of elderly members of the smaller bourgeoisie, Mrs. Stephens was unequalled; those rôles were as entirely her own as the rôle of the grande dame was Mrs. Gaston Murray's, and is now Miss Rose Leclercq's. The central point of her career was reached, it is safe to say, in her performance of Mrs. Willoughby, May Edwards's landlady, in the "Ticket of Leave Man," about thirty years ago. Her walk was a study; and the pleasant demureness, not to say primness, of her countenance, and last century's accomplishment of "the nice conduct of a clouded cane" found its counterpart in Mrs. Stephens's nice conduct of a worsted shawl. Dropped a little upon one side, or raised about her shoulders in recognition of the importance of the words that had just fallen from her, that shawl spoke volumes. One wonders whether the young or middle-aged actresses of the present day are preparing for us in the future—those of us who shall live to see them as "first old women"—any such "first old woman" as Mrs. Stephens was during many years.

MUSIC.

MR. H. MACCUNN'S "JEANIE DEANS," AT THE DALY THEATRE.

To write a successful opera is the aim of most composers; the achievement of that aim, one of the most difficult. The choosing of a subject throws them, as it did Metastasio, into uncertainty. Were it not for compulsion, the old Italian librettist declared "that he should remain undecided until the day of judgment." Mr. MacCunn, a Scot by birth, selected for his first opera the story of Jeanie Deans, on which Scott based one of his most fascinating novels; and Mr. J. Bennett, a librettist of wide experience, prepared for him a book offering agreeable lyrics and effective situations. It cannot be said that he has succeeded in presenting a story making a strong appeal to the emotions. The charm of the novel consists in the wonderful portrayal of character, description of scenery, and variety of incident; but nearly all of these things have to be sacrificed in an opera libretto. George Staunton, already in the novel, is a mysterious lover; on the boards, an uninteresting one. The story, shorn of the novelist's magic style, borders at times on the melodramatic. The fact that Scott's novels are household books must, however, be taken into consideration; thus the audience can reconstruct in their minds the whole from the sketch presented to them.

In setting the book to music, the composer has shown considerable skill. By means of clever harmonies and picturesque orchestration, he often invests with a certain interest that which in itself is comparatively commonplace. And with one or two exceptions there is no straining after effect. The exceptions are the two songs sung by Effie in the Tolbooth prison. In the first she recalls the happy days of childhood; in the second, she imagines that she is nursing her babe. The accompaniments reflect not so much the sense of the words as the distraught state of mind of the unhappy girl; the composer's intention is excellent, yet it is carried out, especially in the second, to excess. Mr. MacCunn has devoted much attention to song-writing, and he seems more at home whenever he falls into the song or ballad form. Sir Henry Bishop once wrote an opera entitled "The Heart of Midlothian," and honestly kept within the bounds of ballad-opera. Our composer has aimed higher, and yet there are traces of the past in his music. It seems more like a ballad-opera revised and brought up to date, than a work conceived in the modern spirit. And, again, there are many passages in the orchestral accompaniments which sound as if they had been composed at the piano-forte: they lack life and sustaining power. This is all the more strange, seeing that Mr. MacCunn has given proofs in the past of his skill in handling an orchestra. In the dramatic portions of the opera one has often to take the will for the deed: there is shadow rather than substance. The two scenes in which the composer reaches the highest level both occur in the fourth act. One is the interview with the Queen in Richmond Park; the other, the "Madge" music. The choral element in the opera is of minor importance. There is a good deal of characteristic local colour in the music of Dumbiedykes and Madge Wildfire, and in this matter the composer shows knowledge and sympathy. One very good feature in the work is that the interest gradually rises. The third and fourth acts are far more attractive than the first and second; this, of course, partly results from the dénouement of the story itself. The scene in Richmond Park deserves high praise, though a little compression would prove greatly to its advantage. The fourth act, as we have said, contains fine moments; the actual close, however, is somewhat of an anticlimax.

Now for a few words about the first performance of the work in London on Wednesday afternoon by the Carl Rosa Company. Miss Marie Duma (Jeanie), Miss Alice Esty (Effie), Miss Meislinger (Madge), and Miss Minnie Hunt (the Queen), also Mr. E. C. Hedmond (Staunton), Mr. Alec Marsh (Davie), and Mr. L. Pringle (the Laird of Dumbiedykes) all deserve a word of commendation for their singing, and especially for their distinct enunciation. Mr. Hamish MacCunn conducted. The little work the chorus had to do was well done. The stage management was excellent.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE performance of the Queen's Hall Choral Society on Wednesday evening deserves warm praise. The programme included the first part of Haydn's "Seasons," Saint-Saëns' clever setting of the 19th Psalm, and Mendelssohn's ever popular "Hymn of Praise." The principal vocalists were Miss C. Samuel, and Messrs. Ben Davies, Ffrangcon-Davies, and William Goff. Mr. A. Randegger conducted. There seems every chance of a good and permanent choir in the heart of London.

On Saturday next Prof. C. Hubert H. Parry, director of the Royal College of Music, will deliver the first of a course of three lectures, at the Royal Institution, on "Realism and Idealism in Musical Art," with musical illustrations.

CASSELL'S History of England

WITH ABOUT

2,000 ILLUSTRATIONS

Expressly Executed for the Work by Eminent Artists.

Each Part will contain Ninety-six Pages, and the Work will be completed in Fifty-two Weekly Parts.

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF ENGLAND has been universally recognised, to quote the words of The Standard newspaper, as "THE MOST INTERESTING, INSTRUCTIVE, AND ENTERTAINING HISTORY OF ENGLAND which has yet seen the light."

This celebrated and unique History has just been entirely revised throughout, brought down to the year 1895, and furnished with New Illustrations, at a cost of over £15,000.

The Publishers have now determined to issue a PEOPLE'S EDITION, which will be published at less than half the price at which the work has been hitherto accessible, and will, moreover, be HANDSOMELY PRODUCED.

The Times says:—

"Casell's History of England is excellent in every respect."

The Scotsman says:—

"Casell's History of England is a library in itself."

The Irish Times says:—

"Casell's History of England is the magnum opus."

The LIVERPOOL MERCURY says:—

"In seven particulars 'CASSELL'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND' is unapproached by any other work. Firstly, it covers the entire period of our history from the time these islands were inhabited by the Ancient Britons. Secondly, it embodies the results of all modern historical research into the religious, the moral, the intellectual, the social, the economical, and the political condition of the people at different periods. Thirdly, it is as full of details as it need be. Fourthly, it is popularly written. Fifthly, it is profusely illustrated with Woodcuts, which help the reader to a clearer understanding of the text. Sixthly, it is thoroughly trustworthy, being accurate in its statements of fact, and commendably impartial in its reasonings. Seventhly, it is cheap. The narrative, which embodies the latest results of modern research, is elegantly and entertainingly written; while the engravings, which are multitudinous in number and picturesque in effect, are strictly illustrative of the text, and historically and archæologically correct."

LITERATURE.

CONJURATI ET NONJURATI.

The Life of a Conspirator. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.)

The Life and Times of John Kettlowell. By the Author of "Nicholas Farrer." Edited by Rev. T. T. Carter, Hon. Canon of Christ Church, Oxford. (Longmans.)

THE conspirator in question is Sir Everard Digby. The story is told by one of his descendants, "received, as he was, into the Roman Catholic Church by a Father of the Society of Jesus." The narrator has also written "A Life of Laud by a Romish Recusant." To his present task he brings a high degree of literary skill, and possesses, against the prejudice of clan and creed, whatever safeguard may be afforded by the faculty of humour: witness that delightful piece of irony, The Prig.

The author is indeed somewhat embarrassed at starting. The difficulty of perverting the biography of Digby "into a mere history of the Gunpowder Plot"—considering that his connexion with the Plot is his sole claim upon our interest—is not very formidable. Neither is the obstacle next mentioned:

"Again, in dealing with that plot, to condemn all concerned in it may seem like kicking a dead dog to Protestants, and to Catholics like joining in one of the bitterest and most irritating taunts to which they have been exposed in this country throughout the last three centuries."

This condemnation appears a mere necessity; and one would think would be recognised as such, without bitterness and without reserve, by reasonable folk of either creed. But the author is not discouraged. With a robust assertiveness, easier to envy than to share, he affirms that "the last word has not been said, or is likely to be said, for some time to come"; and adds that "the following pages will not have been written in vain if they have the effect of eliciting from others that which all students of historical subjects ought most to desire—the Truth." The biography is an attempt to account for (and, by accounting for, in some degree to extenuate) one of the famous crimes of history, by showing how one who is described as a paragon of virtue was drawn into complicity therewith. The story is told in a zigzag of episodes, each duly apologised for, so that the reader (as Lamb remarks about Fuller) "is taken into a kind of partnership with the writer." The point of view is adjusted so that facts are seen in due and delicate perspective; and it is changed often, so as to delay any definite condemnation of the agents of a plot rightly qualified by the biographer as "inhuman, detestable, diabolical." We are shown the successive lapses from right whereby the final descent was made easy to Sir Everard. We are told of the horror with which he at first received the revelation of the plot from its author, Catesby. We are given a sketch of the arguments, Scriptural and other, by which his objections were got over. These suggestions are, of course, conjectural; but they are probable, and offered with a half-humorous candour: it would be impossible to treat a horrible theme more pleasantly. The slaughter of the Canaanites, the treachery of Jael, and Deborah's song of triumph in its success are arrayed as precedents:

"Might not, and ought not the English Catholics to sing much such a song in honour of Catesby, Digby, and their fellow-conspirators, when the king and parliament should be blown up, and fall and lie down at their feet, where they should fall down dead? . . . Surely, too, if Holy Writ did not specially mention gunpowder, it constantly threatened one of its ingredients—namely, brimstone—to the wicked. Under the old dispensation, it was considered a religious duty to fall upon the enemies of the Lord and slay them; under the new, it would be as religious a duty to get under them and slay them. This was merely a detail."

This is a rather comic, Mikado-like, Catesby, not without a relish for the "horrible preparations," and anticipating, in his style of exegesis, the Newgate ordinary in Jonathan Wild, who preferred punch "because it was a liquor nowhere spoken against in Scripture."

The portrait prefixed to the volume shows us a tall form encased in stiff apparel, up from the spurred heels of the thick riding-boots, trunk hose, and heavy gold embroidered jerkin to the ample ruff from which looks out a long visage, with an uneasy, puzzle-headed expression, the right eye drawn downward from the level of the left. We are told more than once that Digby never reached twenty-five years, which accords with Jardine's statement that he was born in 1581, but is difficult to believe in view of the portrait. The face looks five-and-thirty at the youngest. Father Gerard speaks of him as "twenty-six or thereabouts" in 1602, so that if Jardine be right, Sir Everard must have begun early to look older than he was. Soon after Digby's marriage his young wife had been reconciled to the Church of Rome, and was, with her husband, received thereto by Father Gerard, a Jesuit priest. Gerard writes of Digby that "he was so studious a follower of virtue . . . that he became a great comfort to those that had the guiding of his soul . . . he used his prayers daily, both mental and vocal, and daily and diligent examination of his conscience; the sacraments he devoutly frequented every week," &c.

These conversions were not effected without a certain amount of management, "of planning, disguising, hiding, and intriguing"—a state of things necessitated by deadly persecution, but not without its peculiar moral dangers, as the biographer readily allows.

But the prevalence of this malaria of intrigue is no sufficient reason for the virtuous Sir Everard's yielding to the suggestions of Catesby, who, we are told, "began as a libertine, and, after a period of spasmodic piety, ended as a liar." To account for this surrender is the biographer's problem, and it can scarcely be said to have been solved. Whether or not Catesby began with such Scriptural argument as has been found for him, he went on in a more mundane fashion. He alleged that he had obtained the consent of Garnet, provincial of the priests, to the scheme. Not as to particulars, indeed, but in general terms had the approval been given. (Catesby had really put a case, which he chose to consider analogous to the plot, of innocent persons perishing during the storm of a beleaguered city.) Then he showed Sir Everard a book by a certain M.D., "wherein the principal point of the case was judged," and this "had the effect of turning the scale and inducing Digby to join in the infamous plot."

Then, again, we are told that the "first and most potent" cause of his consent was "the friendship and love he bore to Catesby . . . that for his sake he was ready to hazard himself and his estate": that he endeavoured "to regard the matter from Catesby's point of view, and he found the process simple if not agreeable." The pleading goes on. The advocate allows that his client was "persuaded with great difficulty," that he "disliked the look of the whole thing, and finally consented to it after cool and deliberate reflection." Yet on the very same page we read that, after weighing the matter carefully, he decided "in a spasm of wrongheadedness."

Though it is very reasonably admitted that Digby should not have taken at second-hand the "vaunted Jesuit approval," the blame is laid on Catesby for having deceived his trusting friend as he deceived all the conspirators. Garnet himself is said to have been "the innocent dupe of Catesby." This phrase is rather too strong. Garnet's own account of the critical interview (here given from Father Pollen's book on the plot), wherein the case was put about the destruction of innocents in war, ends with this remarkable admission:

"And in truth I never imagined anything of the King's Majesty, nor of any particular, and thought it as it were an idle question, till I saw him, when we had done, make solemn protestation that he would never be known to have asked me that question as long as he lived."

Much virtue is there in that "till."

Garnet's suspicions, then, were aroused. And it is hard to imagine that a man in his position could not, had he willed, have taken steps to verify or disprove them. Over-simplicity is not a failing usually imputed to the Jesuits; and he was their provincial, their highest authority, in touch with the General and the Pope, with all the means of information which that office would give. In the face of death, he owned and asked pardon for not having revealed "his general knowledge had of Mr. Catesby out of confession." When the details had been revealed to him in confession he was "amazed." It was a "most horrible thing." In view, perhaps, of the failure of the plot, he thought the Pope would send him to the galleys, "for he will assuredly think I am privy to it." And yet he stirred no finger to prevent it. As Mr. Green has written: "Horror-stricken as he represented himself to have been, he had kept the secret and left the Parliament to its doom."

And Digby, too, must have had his suspicions as to any express ecclesiastical sanction when Oatesby demanded of his associates a promise that they would not mention the subject in confession, "lest their ghostly father should discountenance or hinder it." But, so far as appears, he inquired no further. Oatesby at once broke his own arrangement by confessing the plot to Father Greenway, with leave to disclose it, under the same seal, to Garnet.

Not till the September of 1605 had Digby been drawn into the plot. In October, Guy Faux was his guest at Gothurst. One evening they had retired to talk apart. The chill damp of the autumn dusk sent Digby's thoughts away to "a certain fireless cellar in Westminster," and he whispered his fear that the twenty barrels of powder left there since March had "grown dank, and that some new must be provided, lest that should not take fire." Reflection had brought no compunctious visitings of nature, nor shaken his fell purpose.

He was to play his part not in London but in the country. He was to get together arms and men ready for action at the rendezvous of Dunchurch. There, while playing cards, he learnt from Oatesby himself the news that the plot had failed, with the astounding addition that the King and Cecil were dead. No details were given, yet Digby is represented as believing the statement, and as sallying forth on the strength of it to raise the Catholic gentry. His biographer compares him to the Knight of La Mancha. But he was a queer Don Quixote, who deserted his friends in their extreme peril, rode away to give himself up, and was taken by the hue and cry he was endeavouring to dodge. His conscience—it is his own statement—was only awakened by the disapproval of his co-religionists:

"The doubts I had of my own good state, which only proceeded from the censure of others, caused more bitterness in me than all the miseries that ever I suffered."

Considering that he had lived on terms of cordial intercourse and good-fellowship with his Roman fellow-countrymen, this extreme and genuine surprise is noteworthy. In his own familiarity with the enterprise he forgot that others might feel that horror which for him had ceased to exist. There was no hesitation in the action of the honest country squires—Digby's own uncle called the conspirators a "band of traitors," Sir John Talbot threatened his son-in-law Winter with arrest unless he galloped off at once. Everywhere on their hopeless attempted march to Wales the plotters were repulsed by their co-religionists.

This schism is significant. The biographer has striven hard to prevent the bonds of family and faith from interfering with the free and fair treatment of his theme. His candour appears in his deciding, in accordance with evidence, that the conspirators were not driven by desperation into their crime, and that they committed it deliberately. He dismisses with proper contempt the suggestion that Cecil was at the bottom of it: adding, "Whether Cecil, or the devil, or both, put the idea into the heads of the conspirators, little, if at all, affects their guilt." But it may well be that, without blame, he has been hindered by his antecedents from following to its full consequences the story he has so ably told. This divergence of view as to the plot, manifesting itself at once and spontaneously, is radical and lasting. Those old-fashioned Roman Catholics stood resolutely super antiquas vias, stood by the commandments of their God and the traditions of their Church. The new papal janissaries acted according to their new morality. Their baneful influence, when it did not mislead, puzzled and paralyzed the honesty and generous instincts of those with whom it was paramount. In their maxims and practice of that day the system, subsequently attacked by Pascal and further developed by modern casuists, was latent. There was nothing in the Powder Plot more revolting to an ordinary Christian than in the St. Bartholomew Massacre, a generation before. That crime had received, on its success, the highest ecclesiastical sanction and approval. It had been commemorated at Rome by a solemn procession and a papal medal. Even of the Powder Plot there was no formal papal condemnation. But the arch-priest Blackwell stigmatised it, on its failure, as a "detestable device"—as the honest huntmen at Dunchurch had felt it to be.

Digby's repentance was doubtless earnest when it came, but it was long in coming. Even the refusal of Sir John Talbot to enter into the "holy war" did not deter him from his purpose, and he watched his unwilling followers, pistol in hand, ready to shoot the first deserter. On his surrender, and during his imprisonment, he wrote verses "with a tincture of piety and devotion in them," and a paper of good advice to his children, in which no word is said as to the cause of his death. Only in the shadow of the gallows did he see the error of his course:

"If he had known it from the first to have been so foul a treason he would not have concealed it to have gained a world, requiring the people to witness he died penitent and sorrowful for this vile treason."

Considering Digby's docility to his spiritual pastors, what sort of training can his conscience have received from them, that only in the article of death was its insensibility removed? that he did not know a crime to be a crime? His biographer pleads for him:

"If he mistook atrocious murder for legitimate warfare it was with the hope of restoring his fellow-countrymen to the religion of their fathers. . . . His sole motive had been to benefit human souls and serve the cause of religion."

Surely in this apology there is the echo of the maxim that the means are sanctified by the end. Another is quoted in the dictum of "the greatest of all historians of the Stuart period" on behalf of the conspirators, that "they had boldly risked their lives for what they honestly believed to be the cause of God and of their country." The words occur in a passage of restrained pathos, closing the dismal story of the plot. Touched by its gentleness and human pity, the reader may yet demur to this particular expression, however gladly the biographer of Digby may adopt it. To vary a saying of Johnson: "A man who plans a murder may be pretty certain that he is committing sin." A Christian is barred from the belief that murder is meritorious by the very elements of his religion. If he can so far force or sophisticate his conscience as to entertain it, that is of itself an additional crime. To condemn such a crime is not to pass sentence on the criminal. That is for Another, Who alone can judge. But the verdict should be given boldly. To hesitate or to qualify it unduly is to bow to the immoral though highly popular superstition, that crime, if only it be political, is none, and that history and the human heart hold such criminals in honour.

It is a far cry from the Powder Plotters, with their humanity warped by fanaticism, and their consciences indurated by the long contemplation of intended crime, to the gentle enthusiasts for an exiled king and a fallen dynasty. The story of the Nonjurors, till their extinction on the death of Charles Edward in 1788, is pleasingly, if not convincingly, told in this little volume by the author of Nicholas Ferrar. Canon Carter has prefixed thereto a short introduction, in which he says:

"It is not surprising that the Higher Church party, holding as it did the Church's sacramental system in its integrity, should have adhered firmly, as a matter of unquestionable obligation, to the doctrine which by that time had grown in strength, of the divine right of kings, they assumed it as an absolute truth."

He claims that with the Nonjurors went necessarily the traditions and tone of the Higher Church line, that the loss of that section of Churchmen brought on the spiritual decline, the reaction against which was the strength of the Evangelical revival, and that their principles were resuscitated in the Oxford Movement: in short, that in the Nonjurors lay the line of the succession of true Anglican doctrine.

Many staunch English Churchmen would demur to this claim. They would consider that "divine right," regarded as the exclusive appanage of a particular family, was a mere superstition. They would hold as axiomatic the mutual obligation of king and people, would agree with the Parliament of 1610 that English kings were not absolute, would believe in the existence of fundamental laws, and in the fact that James II. had broken them. These facts and principles found no place in the Nonjurors' premises. Their deductions, however logical, would not stand the strain of practical life. On its realities they had little hold. They had stood with admirable loyalty by the King, though he belonged to an alien Church, till he sought the ruin of their own. Their principles forbade them to go further than a passive resistance, but they summoned the aid of others who could go further. They invited William, and, by so doing, put into his hands a power that was really, though not nominally, royal. But, when names and things came together, they drew back from the result of their own action, and disowned and refused the achieved deliverance. Many of their number did not perceive that, by withholding their allegiance from the sovereigns accepted by the nation, they were passively assisting the tyrant it had rejected, and doing their best to restore him to the power he had abused. Some, of course, did see this, and acted accordingly, opening communication with St. Germain, and giving James a list of the Nonjuring clergy.

Yet, on the other hand, things should have been made easier for their genuine, if over-scrupulous, honesty. Left to themselves they might have become reconciled to the new order, guaranteeing as it did the safety of the Church from persecution in the interests of Rome. Their consciences might then have admitted the needful enlightenment of common sense. They might have realised that not only the powers that had been, but the powers that were, had claim to their obedience; that the revolt which they likened to Jeroboam's might be, like his, from the Lord. The best spirits among them would have been saved from the weariness and fretfulness of schism, and the rank and file might have had a more edifying moral history than, according to the unexceptionable witness of Samuel Johnson, they managed to achieve.

R. C. BROWNE.

"TUDOR TRANSLATIONS."—Plutarch's Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romans. Englished by Sir Thomas North, anno 1579. With an Introduction by George Wyndham. (David Nutt.)

It was full time we had a handy and beautiful edition of North's Plutarch. Of all Mr. Henley's "Tudor Translations" this was the most needed; and it is "introduced" by one who thoroughly appreciates it, as "a book most sovereign in its dominion over the minds of great men in every age. Of good English prose there is much, but of the world's greatest books in great English prose there are not many. Here is one," continues Mr. Wyndham, "worthy to stand with Malory's Morte Darthur on either side the English Bible."

Mr Roberts has lately pointed out, in a pretty little monograph, that we are often forgetful of our debt to Boeotia, in the dazzle of Athenian splendour; yet the country that bred such men of action as Pelopidas and Epaminondas, such poets as Pindar, such historians as Plutarch, cannot but be worthy of honour. For while to the poet and the scholar the Theban singer must always remain a glory and a joy, no man or woman that cares for noble persons or noble deeds but must take pleasure in, if not an example from, the book of the Cheronæan. With much of Herodotus' charm of narrative, and some of Thucydides' deep thought, Plutarch, like Snorre, has contrived to give his biographies a double interest—political and human.

The book that brings home to us the lives and thoughts of them that laid the foundations of very much that is most praiseworthy and stable in this Europe of our days; the book that was loved and honoured by Montaigne and Shakspeare, needs no praise. And yet this book, which had the extraordinary fortune of meeting two translators of supreme ability in Amyot and North, has not, latterly, had its full measure of readers in England. The wretched translations of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries commonly known as "Langhorne's" and "Dryden's" (the latter worked over to some extent, but not sufficiently, by Clough), in their dull politeness and poor, thin wordiness, are responsible for this neglect of the Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romans; and, as a consequence, it would seem, for the general but deplorable modern inability to write a biography in less than 500 pages; and for that curious indifference of English scholars to such important eras as that of Alexander and his successors.

"You may prove yourselves," says old North, "that there is no prophane studye better than Plutarke. All other learning is private, fitter for Universities than cities, fuller of contemplacion than experience, more commendable in the students themselves than profitable unto others. Whereas stories are fit for any plane reader to all persons, serve for all tymes, teache the living, revive the dead, so farre excellling all other bookes, as it is better to see learning in noblemen's lives than to reade it in Philosophers' writings. Nowe for the author. . . I beleve I might be bold to affirme that he hath written the profitablest story of all Authors. For all other will fayne to take their matter, as the fortune of the contries whereof they wrote fell out: but this man being excellent in wit, learning and experience, hath chosen the speciall actes of the best persons of the formost nations of this world."

These words are absolutely true and just; North understood the immense educational power that lay in Plutarch's work. Gordon recommended it as the best reading for young officers; and by it, in the past, as we know, not a few have been spurred to high endeavour and patient endurance.

The present edition, pleasant to read, light to hold, handsome to look on, is still, though wonderfully cheap, a library edition. Some day Mr. Henley and Mr. Nutt may see their way to printing another, cheaper and more compact, that may supersede the futilities of Langhorne & Co., and find its way among some of those who are, after the manner of Mr. Cobden, apt to think the Greeks and Romans "a set of people whose doings can have precious little to teach us." The wise schoolmaster will not, however, wait for this hypothetical Plutarch, but hasten to secure the present volumes, as fast as they appear, for his school reading-room. The committee of every town library should replace their "trade edition" by this one. Even the man lucky enough to possess a folio North will still be anxious to have these pretty octavos for usual and comfortable reading.

As to Mr. Wyndham's remarkable exposition, nothing so true, so sympathetic, so sincere, has, to my knowledge, been attempted in English on the subject since North laid down his pen. It is no vain parade of allusion, or tickling panegyric, but an honest endeavour to direct the reader how he may approach and profit by a very wonderful and valuable book. Mr. Wyndham seems to have caught some of Plutarch's inspiration from the careful and close attention he has given him, and he has taken the trouble to express himself with a discretion of diction and felicity of phrase that are worthy of his high subject. He has chosen to honour his author by his good writing, as Machiavel was wont to honour his library by dressing in his best when he retired to read. Mr. Henley has always been happy in finding those who will work worthily beside him; but he has been exceptionally favoured in getting Mr. Wyndham to undertake this well-planned and well-executed edition of North's version of Amyot's Plutarch.

F. YORK POWELL.

King Stork and King Log. By Stepniak. (Downey).

WHEN Edmund Burke said, regarding one of his rivals in a parliamentary election at Bristol, that his death reminded him what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue, he was surely not speaking of a man whose life had been devoted to altruistic objects. A life spent in the service of humanity is not a life spent in the pursuit of shadows. Few of us can approve of all Stepniak's methods; but all of us may approve his ends, which were to lighten the load of suffering he saw around him, and to leave his country at least a little better than he found it.

We have rarely read a book on which the life's work of the author is so clearly stamped as this, the last work of Stepniak. Every page bears testimony to his hatred of oppression and his sympathy with the oppressed. It mattered nothing to Stepniak that he had himself rejected the consolations of revealed religion; he had fully grasped the truth of the Great Frederick's utterance: "Let every one go to heaven in his own way." No one—not even Count Tolstoy himself—has denounced the persecution of Jew and Stundist more boldly than he. "I venture also to surmise that in better circumstances the Jewish people would produce more Spinozas than Shylocks." It would be difficult to match this for liberalism of thought in all the writings of Slavdom. That there is a jealousy of the Jew deep down in the Slav nature, from which even the noblest are not quite free, is a fact patent to all who know the East of Europe. The late Tzar's Government are not responsible for the existence of this feeling, but they are responsible for fanning the slumbering embers of religious prejudice into the flames of racial hate. There were Jew-riots before 1881, but since that year the Government have taken the lead in a civil war against one class of their subjects. Formerly the Greek merchants used to incite and head the mob in Odessa; now we are informed that the Russian merchants there take the lead in Jew-baiting. But Alexander III. surpassed his subjects as a Jew-hater. Stepniak tells us that a special measure was passed in 1886 making one section of citizens (the Jews) liable to heavier punishments than others for the same offences. It has been well said that hatred for the Jew springs not from the Christian soul, but from anti-Christian instincts.

Our author describes briefly the late Tzar's government in Poland and in Finland. We have only space here for one illustration. In Warsaw there is a home for the deaf and dumb, in which these unfortunates are given some instruction to mitigate their terrible isolation from the rest of their fellow-beings. In 1891 the head of the educational department ordered that this institute should not be an exception to the official prohibition of the native (Polish) language, and that the teaching should be in Russian.

"The inmates had to be taught to spell with their fingers the Russian alphabet, and compose with it Russian words. So that these unfortunates, who were for the most part peasants, on returning to their native villages, could not make the slightest use of the training given to them at the institute, and were plunged again into that awful isolation from which their kind-hearted friends had tried to rescue them."

We quote these sentences as characteristic of the writer who bore with fortitude his own misfortunes, and reserved his eloquence for the misfortunes of others.

The Jews enjoyed halcyon days under Alexander II., to whom hardly sufficient credit is given by our author for his genuine liberalism in the matter of Jewish education; but it was not so with their Protestant fellow countrymen, the Stundists. Even under Alexander II. they were persecuted unremittingly.

An extremely interesting statement by an eye-witness is given on p. 221 (vol. i.), from which we learn that Stundists are put in chains and have their heads shaven like the convicts in the mines. It was already known that thousands of Stundists—whose only crime is their dissent from the dead formalism of the Orthodox Church—are exiled to Siberia and the Caucasus by mere administrative order. No one is spared except Count Tolstoy, who is shielded from his own Government by the public opinion of enlightened Europe. Prince Khilkov, whose family descend in direct line from the house of Rurik, and who was the youngest general in the Russian army, abandoned his career as contrary to the teaching of Christ. He rebuked Ambrosius, the Archbishop of Kharkov, for inciting the people to brutalities against the inoffensive Stundists. For thus boldly opposing wickedness in high places, this believer in Christ's Christianity has been exiled to the Caucasus. We abstain here from quoting the revolting details—the outrages on defenceless women—which were given in the pathetic letters to Pennsylvanian Friends penned by the despairing Stundists in 1892.

The distinguishing feature between the thinkers of antiquity and those of modern times is that, while the former relegated the golden age to a distant past, the latter look forward to a golden age in the near future. The magic word Progress passes as current coin even in the Tzar's realm.

"Perhaps you will live to see the happy moment when the country enfranchised shall open her arms to her faithful children, who love her and whom she loves, so as to celebrate with them the feast of freedom. Then, friends, you will remember us, and this will be our great reward for all our trials."

Thus wrote Bernstein at the foot of the Yakutak gallows. No one was more acquainted with horrors than Stepniak. He relates here the sufferings of those exiled by administrative order to the Arctic zone, where the average temperature for the autumn and winter months is 31° Fahr. below zero, and for the whole year is only 1° Fahr. above zero. He charges the Government of Alexander III. with a "decided" inclination to extend the practice of administrative exile to these uninhabitable deserts. He describes the Yakutak massacres, and the flogging to death of Mme. Nadejda Sihida at Kava, which both happened in 1889. Thanks to the Times, these tragedies made the round of the world.

Yet Stepniak utters no cry of despair, or even of despondency. The literary chief of the Nihilists, in the concluding chapter of his last work, looks forward with hope to the future of his country. His words may be regarded either in the light of a prophecy, or as a political testament to the Russian people.

"This slow, unconscious, and irresistible—geological progress we may call it, for it is like the secular changes in the structure of our planet—this progress will surely land us imperceptibly and safely into political freedom, if we are prepared to wait for it another hundred years."

He then explains how the Russian people will hasten its march, and how a consultative Chamber would stave off the danger of a violent outburst. The late Tzar used always to side with his few favourite Ministers, such as M. Pobiedonostev, who were a minority in the State Council; but if his son and successor were first to allow the creation of a consultative Chamber, and then were to abstain from obstructing the will of the majority in that Chamber, the game of the conspirator would be up. As Stepniak puts it—"We should have a national representation de facto, and there is not a fool among the Nihilists who would care to disturb the Tzar in the placid enjoyment of his sovereignty."

Stepniak's English is an intellectual treat—his mastery of our idioms was so complete, his style so nervous, terse, and crisp. A fighter all his life, Stepniak has now passed "to where beyond these voices there is peace."

The Poetry of Pathos and Delight. From the Works of Coventry Patmore. Selected by Alice Meynell. (Heinemann.)

MR. COVENTRY PATMORE is fortunate in his selectors. His poetry had been most effectively represented in a volume of selections published several years before Mrs. Meynell took the congenial work in hand. That example of the Patmorian anthology was one of the most entirely satisfactory instances of critical selection that could be cited. Mrs. Meynell's charming little book deserves no less distinguished praise. Both volumes will be equally esteemed by lovers of poetry, and should hold posts of equal honour on the shelves that contain their choicest and most intimate favourites. Too often in this age of anthology-making we are compelled to face the sad reminder that the work of selection from a poet is, after all and above all, a critical process. It is not what is known in Bond-street as a "one-man show." The object in view is not the filling-up of a given space with specimens, regardless of congruity or value. Yet have we seen selections of poetry that are little else than ill-assorted jumbles, without any perceptible unity of plan or purpose or illustration. Passages are ruthlessly torn out, as it were, from their vital context, and lyrics there are from which a stanza has been arbitrarily detached. These violent ravishings of the poetic garden make a dismal and maimed show in a book of selections; and what should be an imperishable garden of delights, ever fruitful and fair, suggests rather an ill-furnished and unordered hortus siccus.

Mrs. Meynell has produced an exemplary book. The scheme of selection is simple, yet comprehensive. It aims at giving such passages of Mr. Patmore's poetry as deal primarily with pathos and delight—"those human and intelligible passions to which all real poetry has access." Common to all poetry are these universal passions. The plan embraces the whole of the poet's verse, the Angel in the House not less than the later Odes. The selection shows in various ways the judgment and sympathy of one who is herself critic and poet. The more intimate and profound the reader's knowledge of Mr. Patmore's poetry may be, the keener must be his appreciation of Mrs. Meynell's fine discrimination and fastidious taste. Especially to be commended is the spirit that has governed her selections from the Angel in the House. That much-discussed poem, which has proved something of a wall of separation among critics and lovers of poetry, yields many of the most convincing passages in the volume. In them you may read Mr. Patmore's title clear, since only the poet by his heavenly alchemy could transmute the ordinary things of the common round of life—"the dailiest things," as Mrs. Meynell puts it—to spirit and fire. And this triumph has been achieved in a fashion as original and potent as the art of it is admirable. The "domesticity" which affronts some does not affect Mrs. Meynell with timorous misgivings or temporising apologies. She grasps the essential truth—the investment of the domesticity with spirit and fire. The religion of household laws, the "fearful innocence" that is their controlling genius—these are the poet's themes; and to me they appear not less excellent, and in Mr. Patmore's example somewhat more admirable, than the most brilliant of those technical exploits or metrical exercises, dexterously modelled after some dead master, which in these latter days inevitably receive effusive praise. To the Angel in the House, even more than to the Odes, is due the solitary position which Mr. Patmore holds among contemporary poets. He is not one of a chorus, as Mrs. Meynell observes, but is "single in our day, and single in our literature." Like all poets of individual note, he has escaped the plague of a following, which happiness is itself a tribute to the dignity of his station among the English poets. Mrs. Meynell's volume should certainly gain for the poet's works new readers. Such is the hope that inspired her undertaking, and it is the best motive that could move the maker of selections from a poet. Not to stay at the vestibule, but to enter the temple, is what Mrs. Meynell desires of her readers; and I think there can be no apprehensions on this score.

I Married a Wife. By John Strange Winter. (White.)

In his latest novel Mr. Richard Dowling goes some way toward redeeming melodrama from vulgarity, and reconciles us to a conventional plot. He is always the master of his theme, and always interesting; moreover, his story is not without imagination and poetry, and his characters are alive. Frank Jeaters is a handsome man: shallow, conceited, superficially attractive, but really caring for no one but himself. He is married to a pretty little woman, whose character lacks strength, though it is strong enough to love him absolutely. When the story opens Frank Jeaters has already become tired of his wife, and by a kind of unconscious design he has brought her to a dank, almost uninhabited hotel on the Thames. He has not exactly planned murder, but he has given himself to the devil so far as to plead with him to do his work for him. The loving wife walks in her sleep; if a trap-door over the river were accidentally left open and the somnambulist were to fall through, who could blame him? Jeaters has not been brought to this sorry pass without a goad: he cherishes an illicit passion for a young girl who has really given her heart to another, John Crane; so that Frank Jeaters has sold his soul for nothing. From this point the pace becomes furious, and we are introduced to situations dear to the lovers of sensational effect. But for all that the book has its moments; John Crane's experiences in the primeval forest are described with force and with no little sensibility, which absolve the work from the charge of being tawdry and unreal.

Mr. Joseph Hatton is a past-master in the art of constructing a skilful novel, and his story of the French Revolution shows that his pen has lost nothing of its cunning. But he asks us to forgive a good deal, especially when he would have us believe that the Count de Fournier is able to assume the character of Grébauval and persuade all and sundry that he is none other than the dead man. This kind of thing is all very well when a lapse of years has made it possible to mislead folk; but a chance resemblance, when there is no such aid to fraud, is not a sufficient warrant to induce the most daring to venture upon the deception. Miss Mary Rowsell in her recently published novel, The Friend of the People, anticipated Mr. Hatton; but what is an incident in the latter is the main motive of the former book. When Greek meets Greek shows that Mr. Hatton has not read Carlyle for nothing, and he has an affinity with Dumas père. The hero of the tale, although by no means a blind partisan, has a strong bias toward the Loyalist cause—the obviously picturesque side. The story is full of interest; it is not overloaded with dialogue, nor with description; therefore it is never wearisome.

Mr. Harold Spender has had the courage to make the hero of his tale of the French Revolution an anti-Royalist by conviction, though his sentiments are with the aristocrats. The king must die; but Louvier had no heart for the excesses into which the rival revolutionary factions betrayed each other. He has governed the people under his own authority mildly, but firmly; still he is horror-stricken when he returns from his province to Paris at the bloodshed going on all around him. The love interest of the novel centres in Elise Duplay, beloved by Louvier, but also by Robespierre. Edmund Burke figures in the tale, and we have some entertaining scenes in London. This is a poetical and spontaneous description of the lurid times it essays to depict. It is, in fact, a work of conspicuous achievement and even greater promise.

Another book by a new author, The Court Adjourns, disposes us to think well of his future. Two men, firm friends, love one girl. They make a compact not to speak to her of their love until such time as they have agreed that one shall break silence. Maxwell, self-reliant and vain, ignores the compact, thinking he can easily push aside his friend, Dr. Blunt, who is reserved and diffident. The girl, believing that Blunt, whom she secretly loves, cares nothing for her, is betrayed into accepting Maxwell. The latter's deception turns Blunt's nature. He thinks he will do no sin in murdering his betrayer. Then comes the inevitable remorse. In the end he finds he cannot marry the woman he loves, though the prize is now in his grasp; he loves her too dearly to link her life with his. Instead, he gives himself up to justice, is tried and sentenced to death; but the sentence is changed into penal servitude for life. "They say he will be there for thirty years, and then perhaps we shall both be old together," said the stricken girl, clinging to the shreds of hope. This tale has pathos, and it is written fluently and intelligently.

The motive of A Romance of Wastdale, another book by a new author worthy of serious consideration, is not altogether dissimilar to that of The Court Adjourns. A dreamer, David Gordon, idealises a commonplace girl, turning her in his mind into a saint. But she is a very ordinary piece of clay. Chance discovers to him her past, which, though not seriously compromised, is certainly by no means of a nature to gain her lover's indulgence. The man who has entangled her, Hawke, chances to fall into Gordon's power. The two men meet face face on the ice-clad mountains. Hawke asks Gordon to open a bottle of brandy for him. Instantaneously Gordon remembers that a friend of his had lost his life in opening a bottle, the neck of which had burst and cut an artery. The idea occurs to him that he can be rid of his friend in a like manner. With ruthless savagery he gives effect to the idea. The scene is presented with power; it is graphic and intense; it would form a splendid stage picture. For one thing, Gordon cannot forgive himself. In his exultant joy at having destroyed his enemy he yields to a craven impulse and strikes him across the mouth. The crime itself occasions Gordon no remorse; but he cannot justify his departure from the unwritten rules observed by gentlemen. A Romance of Wastdale has high merit; it is dramatic and it is literary.

Miss Blanche Atkinson writes wholesomely and seasonably. If we must have this constant flood of novels, let us have more of this kind. It is true to life; it describes people and places faithfully and attractively; it has humour and it has pathos. The heroine is a thoroughly sweet-minded girl and healthily content to be a woman. The curate is not a caricature, as so many clergy in modern fiction are found to be; he is a man of high, unselfish character and true to his calling. There is a really clever sketch of a common type—the girl who imagines herself a great artist, but who is really nothing better than a bore.

A book consisting of six detective stories, all of which are distinctly clever, needs no particular notice in these days, when the vogue for such stories created by Dr. Conan Doyle shows no sign of having had its day. Mr. Arthur Morrison has a lively imagination and an ingenious fancy; he weaves interesting and exciting tales; he conceives crimes of the most wonderful description; and he sustains his themes without once letting them straggle or slide away from him.

Perhaps it is unfair to take Mr. Le Queux's romances seriously. We get horrors, tragedies, and "penny dreadfuls" in abundance, and murders in omnibuses and trains. There is the wicked but beautiful woman who ruins men right and left, handing them over to the devil; the artist's model who wastes her affections on the weak-minded hero; the husband who returns at the right moment; the convict who comes out of the mines to marry a woman and returns immediately afterwards.

The tale is simply a nightmare: the kind of thing we all dream when we have overworked the brain or stomach. Of course, it is something of a feat to be able to recall such bad dreams as these, and Mr. Le Queux is to be congratulated on doing what few can do more effectively.

It was necessary that "John Strange Winter" should return to that order of story which made her famous; and her latest book belongs to that innocent type. It is, in fact, a spontaneously written little tale of a charming young girl who is always trying to do good among the poor: she has more zeal than discretion. Of course, after so strong and original a work as A Blameless Woman, which marked a great advance on Mrs. Stannard's previous effort, and A Magnificent Young Man, which is also a notable book, one is scarcely prepared to put up with small beer of this kind. But the young person must be appeased. Mrs. Stannard has proved herself capable of dealing effectively with the deeper feelings and passions, and we hope she will presently return to such work.

MACAN'S HERODOTUS.

Herodotus. The Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Books. With Introduction, Notes, Appendices, Indices, Maps. By R. W. Macan. (Macmillans.)

Pol me occidistis, amici, non servastis, must be the cry of many a reader of the new literature on Herodotus. We cannot shut our eyes to the cumulative force of many little arguments; yet we would fain have our gratissimus error back again, and with it a Herodotus whom we might trust implicitly. Now we hardly know what is given us as a substitute for that once familiar figure. An artful person, it seems, one who says he travelled where he probably did not travel, who borrows from authors whom he does not name to extents which he does not specify, who did not really go to the bottom of anything, and who, above all, had the unhappy power of covering up his traces. The summit of the writer's art, says Mr. Macan,

"is to have all but completely obliterated the evidences of that process by which his work reached its relative perfection, rendering any and every hypothesis on the subject apparently beyond the conditions of absolute verification."

No one, of course, denies Herodotus' "merits as a writer, as an artist, as a prose poet." But we are not happy when this is the only praise given, and we sit down with a sigh to a new application of "the methods of analytic and discriminative criticism."

Yet no one can deny that the task is extraordinarily well performed. The varying values of the different parts of a most multifarious whole have never been looked into with a keener eye than Mr. Macan's. The art of Herodotus' final revision is pitted against native shrewdness and a thorough connaissance de cause in his critic. The victory rests sometimes here, sometimes there, and the fight is a tough one. Herodotus will not always yield up the secrets of his workshop; and the more clever Mr. Macan makes his art, the less likely is it that he wrote wild improbabilities without a motive. He did not believe everything he told—he fairly warns us of that; and no doubt he had his reasons for telling gravely many things which we, too, cannot believe. He probably knew as well as any modern that "the account of the Scythian campaign consists of a mixture of physical impossibilities, of inconsistencies, of inconsequences, and of absurdities." If "everyone can see that the Scythian expedition is largely a romance to illustrate a moral," either the artful author was nodding or else he designed that everyone should see it.

It is, no doubt, a good work to sift your Herodotus thoroughly, and the student of that author will owe much to Mr. Macan's patient examination. Sometimes we may suspect that he sees a little too far. The sand, he says (in a note about Hdt. vi. 107), "which covers the tooth of Hippas is not due to Herodotean autopsy, but to Athenian verisimilitude." We are really not sure that we seize his meaning, though the words do suggest that mares' nests, like ostriches', may be built of sand.

It is a part of Mr. Macan's plan to devote a protracted and very thorough examination to certain single incidents of importance, as, for instance, the battle of Marathon, about which, of course, the difficulties cluster thick. "The anachronistic spirit, the element of afterthought, are nowhere more conspicuously present than in the story of Marathon"; and accordingly the battle has an appendix of 100 pages to itself. Mr. Macan's standard of historical credibility is very high, and he lops away ruthlessly every weak hypothesis, except sometimes a little piece of Mr. Macan's own. The reader who goes through all this argumentative and destructive work will be rewarded by finding himself well posted in the newest ideas about all that bears on the central part of Herodotus' great work. The second volume (Appendices) has in our opinion little to compete with it in the matter of thoroughness and penetration, though a clearer indication of positive results would sometimes be acceptable.

The first volume (Text and Notes) finds more competitors in the small English editions of bks. v., vi., published of late years, not to mention somewhat earlier German commentaries. The notes of Messrs. Shuckburgh (1889, 1890) and Abbott (1893) will still be useful, if only because Mr. Macan, intent, we suppose, on full and leisurely discussion of great issues, has not always found room for a note where a note would have been useful. For instance, we are afraid that most readers of Hdt. iv. 42 will never understand, if they are not specially told, what physical fact was meant by the Phoenicians "having the sun on their right hand." Why were the Persian roads guarded (Hdt. v. 35 and elsewhere), and what did it mean exactly? The λευστήρ of v. 67 is not sufficiently explained by a reference to Liddell & Scott.

It is the second volume in which Mr. Macan really shows his strength. The Introduction in vol. i. stands on the same level; but in vol. ii. (pp. 1-311) we have appendices on the Scythas ("a combination of diverse elements"); the Geography of Scythia; the Expedition of Darius in Europe; the Persians in Thrace; the Chronology of the Ionian Revolt; the Annals of 493-491 B.C.; Spartan History; Athens and Aegina; Inner Athenian History (Herodotus and the new Ἀθηναίων Παιδεία); Marathon; the Persian Expedition; the Libyan Logi; the Royal Road (Mr. Macan is able to refer to Prof. Ramsay's improvement of the route he gave in his Historical Geography of Asia Minor, now published in his Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia); and the Dancing Peacock (a curious Indian parallel to the story of Hippokleides). In all of these essays the reader cannot fail to be struck by the writer's determination not to be put off with words, but to get behind the phrases and see, like a practical man, what really did happen.

We wish, however, that Mr. Macan's language was that of his own age and country.

We all want to know "whether Herodotus ever got him further than Byzantium," but we put the inquiry in other words, and we should certainly recast the question: "How much time remains on the day of Miltiades, his prytany?" If this be old-fashioned English, the words autopsy, nominate (for name), scriptural (for written), motivation, luciferous, and others are startlingly new; while fruppant and suspect (treated as an adjective) are not English at all. Mr. Macan somewhere talks of bedevilling the calendar; what is he doing with our poor old language?

In order to carry through arrangements for the copyrighting in the United States of the new matter in "The Canterbury Burns," to be published by Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack, of Edinburgh, it has been found necessary to delay the publication of vol. 1. till February 8. Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., of Boston, have secured the American rights.

THE Registers of Christ Church, Newgate-street, London, 1538-1754, edited by Mr. Willoughby A. Littledale, have just been issued to the members of the Harleian Society. The Registers, with historical introduction and index, form a volume of 530 pages, and are perhaps most notable for their numerous entries ending with the words "from Newgate" and "prisoner." A bird's-eye view of Christ Church, Newgate, formerly Grey-Friars' Church, and its surroundings about 1547, reduced from a drawing by Mr. H. W. Brewer, forms the frontispiece to the volume.

MR. RIDER HAGGARD has been elected chairman of council of the Incorporated Society of Authors, in succession to Sir W. Martin Conway.

THE third series of lectures given by the Sunday Lecture Society begins on February 2, 1896, in St. George's Hall, Langham-place, at 4 p.m., when Dr. T. W. Drinkwater will lecture on "Rubbish." Lectures will subsequently be given by Dr. D. Morris, Mr. Douglas Carnegie, the Rev. H. N. Hutchinson, Mr. Keith Frith, Mr. Arthur Dacey (of the Japanese Society), and Mr. W. L'Aigle Cole.

THE Rev. Charles F. Aked, minister of Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool, who recently returned from a lecturing tour in the United States, is to deliver an address in Liverpool on February 4, on Mr. W. E. Tirebuck's latest book, Miss Grace of All Souls.

MR. GEORGE REDWAY has brought out this week, at the price of one penny, a poem by Mr. Swinburne, entitled A Word for the Navy. As the publisher states in a prefatory note, he had previously issued it ten years ago, in an edition limited to 250 copies, which is now very rare. Those interested in the bibliography of Mr. Swinburne know that it is also printed as a sort of introduction to an anthology that was issued by the same publisher in 1887, under the title of Sea Song and River Rhyme—a handsome volume, with twelve etched plates, which was edited by Mrs. Davenport Adams. Two or three verbal changes have been made on the present occasion, which we have duly noted; but in the interest of goodwill between nations, it seems undesirable to call more particular attention to them. We prefer to quote, as a sample, the penultimate stanza:

"But thou, though the world should misdoubt thee,
Be strong as the seas at thy side;
Bind on but thine armour about thee
That girds thee with power and with pride.
Where Drake stood, where Blake stood,
Where fame sees Nelson stand,
Stand thou too, and now, too,
Take thy fate in hand."

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

It has become evident that the next burning question to come up for decision, both at Oxford and Cambridge, will be the admission of women to degrees. At Oxford a memorial in favour of the change has been largely signed by resident graduates, and it is rumoured that Council will shortly give Congregation an opportunity of expressing its formal opinion on the subject. At Cambridge a similar memorial has been circulated among "persons of distinction" outside the university, and will be presented next week.

THE course of lectures on "The Council of Trent," which the late J. A. Froude delivered at Oxford during the years 1892-93, will shortly be published by Messrs. Longman & Co.

The date of the conference on secondary education at Cambridge, which it was proposed to hold in the long vacation, has been changed to the month of April.

MR. W. J. COURTHOPE, the new professor of poetry at Oxford, will deliver his inaugural lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre on Saturday, February 17. The subject he has chosen is "Liberty and Authority in Matters of Taste."

THE Rev. Walter Lock, who was appointed last term to Dean Ireland's chair at Oxford, will deliver his inaugural lecture on Wednesday next, in the hall of Keble College, upon "The Exegesis of the New Testament."

PROF. SANDAY, the new Lady Margaret professor of divinity at Oxford, following the practice which he began last term, has again invited outside assistance. Mr. F. C. Burkitt, of Cambridge, will give a public lecture, on February 11, upon "Points in the History of Latin Versions of the Bible," and Mr. F. G. Kenyon will give a public lecture, on February 13, upon "The Autographs of the New Testament," illustrated with lantern slides.

ON the recommendation of the special board for classics at Cambridge, a grant of £50 from the Worts Travelling Scholars' Fund has been made to Mr. W. H. D. Rouse, of Christ's College, towards defraying his expenses in Russia and elsewhere with the object of collecting material for a work on Greek Votive Offerings, to be published by the University Press.

DR. KARL LENTZNER will deliver four lectures, on Mondays during February, at Manchester College, Oxford, on "Goethe and Modern Culture," and on "Literature in its Ethical and Religious Aspects."

THE Oxford Architectural and Historical Society will meet in the afternoon of Saturday next, in the hall of New College. The Warden has kindly promised to exhibit some objects of interest connected with the founder, William of Wykeham: such as his mitre-case, fragments of the mitre itself, a ring, gloves, and an autograph letter with his signature.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE POESIA OF RAPHAEL.

Ah, not as Raphael knew her have we known
The Queen of Song in such a blissful mood,
Nor with such calm divinity endued,
But as another youth her soul has shown.
The youth who voiced our sufferings in his own,
And lived with his life's love at deadly feud:
Half a storm-cloud and half an eagle mewed.
He saw no seraphs hovering round her throne.

His was no Muse that sat indifferent
To the dim worlds beneath her faultless feet;
The Muse of Musset was an angel sent
To pluck all anguish out of all the year,
To make the promises of May more sweet,
And waken hope when autumn leaves lie ere.

OBITUARY.

ALEXANDER MACMILLAN.

WE regret to record the death of Mr. Alexander Macmillan, the publisher, which took place in London, on Saturday, January 25. He was buried on Wednesday in the churchyard of Bramshot, Hindhead, to the neighbourhood of which pleasant Hampshire village he had retired to spend his declining years, when he gave up his suburban residence at Tooting. His health never recovered from the shock which he received in 1889, from the mysterious disappearance of his eldest son, Malcolm, in the mountains of Anatolia.

Alexander Macmillan was born in 1815 at Irvine, on the Ayrshire coast, whither his father had migrated from Arran, though we believe that the original home of the clan was in Argyleshire. An account of the family, and of his own early life, has been given by Tom Hughes in the Memoir of his brother Daniel (1882). The remaining chapters of the story may be read at large in the Bibliographical Catalogue of Macmillan & Co.'s Publications (1891), which is illustrated with fine portraits of the two brothers. It was Daniel who invited him to London in 1839, to join him as an assistant in the house of Messrs. Seeley; and it was Daniel who, at the suggestion and with the pecuniary support of Archdeacon Hare, founded the publishing and bookselling business at Cambridge in 1843. But Daniel died in 1857; and henceforth the firm of Messrs. Macmillan & Co., as we know it, has borne the impress of the younger brother's strong personality. This may be traced in two directions: in the character of the books, and in the growth of the business. While the firm had its headquarters at Cambridge, its publications were chiefly connected with the special studies of that university, and with divinity of the school of F. D. Maurice. When Alexander moved to London, in 1858, the list of authors gradually becomes metropolitan, though his early friends never left him. Macmillan's Magazine, the first shilling monthly, began in 1859, under the editorship of Prof. David Masson; the "Golden Treasury" series was inaugurated by Mr. F. T. Palgrave, in 1861; the "Globe" edition of Shakspeare, by W. G. Clark and Mr. Aldis Wright, appeared in 1864; the "Science Primers" date from 1873; the "English Men of Letters" from 1878; the "Eversley" series from 1881; Tennyson transferred his books to the firm in 1884. Such are some of the landmarks in the growth of Alexander Macmillan's literary ventures. Nor would it be right to omit mention of such names as those of J. R. Green, Prof. Huxley, and John Morley, who never published elsewhere; or the collected editions of Emerson, Lowell, and Whittier.

But lists of authors and of books represent only one side of the activity of a publishing house.

For seventeen years Alexander Macmillan held the position of publisher to the University of Oxford, and received the honorary degree of M.A. when other arrangements were made by the delegates of the Clarendon Press. His name stands on the books of Balliol College. So long ago as 1869 he opened a branch house at New York, which not only acts as agents for the Oxford and Cambridge Presses, and for such firms as Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. and Messrs. George Bell & Sons, but which has also been the means of introducing into England a large number of works by American professors. In the Colonies, too, and in India, it may safely be said that Macmillan & Co. occupy the foremost place.

In these days, when it is sometimes hinted that the part played by a publisher in the production of literature is merely that of a superfluous middleman, it is well to consider the career of such a one as Alexander Macmillan. In him were combined—to an extent perhaps not equalled by any one since the first John Murray—those qualities which sweeten and dignify business, without depriving it of the pecuniary rewards which it deserves. No author ever complains of his relations with Messrs. Macmillan & Co.: many have doubtless received from them more than their books ever earned. And in the case of a work that is highly successful, who shall say how much of the result is due to the style in which the publishers alone knew how to produce it, and to their facilities for giving it a world-wide circulation?

Though Alexander Macmillan is gone, it is pleasant to remember that his name continues to be represented in the firm by three members of a younger generation.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia of Madrid for January opens with a copy by C. Perez Pastor of the will of the first Marqués de Santa Cruz, who died at Lisbon, February 9, 1688, during the preparations for the Armada, of which he had been appointed admiral. It contains clauses giving liberty to faithful slaves, both negroes and Moors, and release of all prisoners condemned by him to the galleys. The will gives the idea of a kindly natured nobleman, whose business affairs were in great confusion. M. Antonio Fabié, in a review of a work by Konrad Häbler, gives some interesting accounts of the commercial relations between Spain and the Hanse towns in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. E. S. Dodgson concludes his "Inscriptions Basques" with epitaphs, mostly modern and trivial, but enriched with some useful philological remarks. Father Pita concludes his publication of documents from the monastery of Santa Clara, Barcelona; he also comments on the will of the celebrated Arnaldo de Villanova (1305), here printed by Roque Chabas.

A NEW DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK, of Edinburgh, have in preparation a new Dictionary of the Bible, under the editorship of the Rev. James Hastings, assisted by specialists in various departments.

The theological articles will chiefly be written by Prof. Armitage Robinson, "Communion"; Prof. Banks, "Hope," "Joy," "Repentance"; Prof. Agar Beet, "Christology"; Canon Bernard, of Salisbury, "Prayer," "Resurrection," "Sin"; Prof. Bernard, of Dublin, "Fall," "Miracles," "Nature"; Principal Burrows, "Appeal," "Fear," "Humility," "Reverence"; Prof. Candlish, "Adoption," "Death," "Life," "Sin in New Testament," "Mediator"; Prof. A. B. ## CORRESPONDENCE.

LISBON LIBRARIES.

Jesus College, Oxford: Jan. 15, 1896.

Some time ago I promised to send two letters to the ACADEMY: one of a general nature, on the chief libraries in Lisbon, and another about a Dante MS. contained in one of them. I now send the former letter, which I have written not because my knowledge is exhaustive or even as extensive as that of some English residents in Lisbon, but because it may be interesting to your readers to learn what treasures, to a great extent unexplored, exist in that city.

A visitor to Lisbon cannot fail to wonder what public buildings the capital of Portugal can have possessed before the suppression of the monasteries. Palaces, museums, hospitals, one Protestant church, workhouses, barracks, police-courts, and schools now enjoy buildings once occupied by various monastic orders. For some of the purposes to which these buildings are applied they must at first have been very unsuitable, and great structural changes must have been necessary to make them tolerably convenient. But for a library an old monastery or convent is very well adapted. The long corridors supply ample shelf-room for ordinary books, the cells provide accommodation for rarer books, MSS., &c. (also furnishing excellent studies), while the old convent library and refectory make good public reading-rooms. It is not, therefore, surprising that great collections of books and MSS. have found their home in disused monasteries.

1. Perhaps the most important of these is the Arquivo da Torre do Tombo, which occupies a part of the great monastery of San Bento at the foot of the Estrella hill. So great was the size of this monastery that, although large portions of its buildings have been demolished, it provides the chambers, committee-rooms, &c., in which the two houses of the Portuguese parliament transact their legislative business. The remainder of the building is occupied by the Arquivo. Several large rooms, probably the refectory, kitchen, &c., are filled with piles of MSS., and the walls are lined with shelves well laden with packets of written matter. There are no books. Print is nothing accounted of in this collection. But the wealth of MSS. is enormous. The collection of State archives is said to exceed any other in number except that of Venice. Every treaty between Portugal and foreign countries is believed to be preserved here. All the minutes of what we should call Cabinet Councils, all documents issued by the direct authority of the sovereign, all the reports of Commissions, Plenipotentiaries, &c., are here treasured.

A considerable amount of space is occupied with the processes of the Inquisition. There must be a great sameness in the contents of these numerous volumes (each possessing over a thousand pages), but it might be useful to have a few typical processes selected and published. Besides these public documents there are the transactions of private companies—e.g., the wine companies of Oporto, records of mercantile ventures in the East, expeditions to the Brazil, reports of envoys and travellers to many a foreign land. In addition, we may find here the private records of almost every institution which has existed in the country. The statutes of monasteries, the proceedings of cathedral chapters, and (perhaps we may add) the charters of colleges and of the University may be here. Mr. Rashdall, in his great work, Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, regrets the scarcity of documents relating to the University of Portugal. It is possible that, if this great repository were thoroughly ransacked, such regret might be unnecessary. I speak of the Portuguese University, or the University of Portugal, for there is only one. It was founded in Lisbon, and afterwards removed to Coimbra, but it has returned to and left the capital several times; so that Mr. Rashdall remarks "he would be a bold man who should positively affirm that the students of Portugal have performed the journey from Coimbra to Lisbon for the last time."

We are told in guide-books and elsewhere that the contents of the Torre do Tombo are being systematically published by the Portuguese Government. No doubt something has been done; but the number of national documents published (as given in Potthast's catalogue) is rather meagre.

But what strikes an Englishman is that nothing has been done to popularise these publications. There is nothing at all corresponding to our Rolls Series, which makes national records the property of the nation. On inquiring at booksellers' shops for something of the kind, I found only one volume on the early nautical achievements of the Portuguese giving copies of original documents. It may be said that very little impression has as yet been made on this great collection, and there is plenty of room for private enterprise. I am told that no obstacle would be placed in the way of anyone properly qualified and recommended who wished to study and publish records here preserved.

2. Not far from San Bento, but more within the city, the Academia Real das Sciencias has its home in the disused monastery of Jesus. The old library, which remains in its original chamber, is well lined with books of ancient date. Several adjoining rooms are fitted up with shelves for the reception of the "Transactions" of many learned societies of Europe and America. There is a written catalogue. In one room is a large collection of MSS. piled up on shelves and tables. Of these there is said to be a written catalogue; but it cannot be of much use, as the MSS. are not arranged in any order and it would take a long time before any individual MS. could be found. The MSS. are said to relate chiefly to the history, antiquities, and industries of Portugal, but doubtless there are in such a collection many works of general interest. It is promised that the MSS. shall shortly be arranged in order and even that a printed catalogue shall be prepared; but it is to be feared that, unless the stimulus of public curiosity be applied, this desirable end will be for sometime postponed to that amanha so dear to the Portuguese temperament. The library does not seem to be much used; but perhaps some allowance should be made for the fact that I visited it in the middle of the long vacation, when readers were conspicuous by their absence. Probably during the sessions of the Academy there would be more signs of study. Great preparations are being made for the accommodation of modern books on the walls of the corridors. The Academia das Sciencias has done good work in the past. The handsome volumes usually called Monumenta Portugaliae bear also the legend, "Jussu Academiae Scientiarum Olisiponensis." Their publication was probably begun under the superintendence of the great historian Alexandre Heroullano, and the contents are drawn from many sources, some being transcripts of MSS. in the library of the Academy, others coming from the Torre do Tombo, the Bibliotheca Nacional, or the Black Book of Coimbra. The style of printing, &c., is magnificent, and the work must be, from its price, beyond the reach of most private persons. It would be interesting to know if the publication is still going on. The last number in the Bodleian is dated 1891.

3. The Bibliotheca Nacional occupies part of the old convent of the Franciscans. I was first drawn to this library by a rumour that it contained unknown works in the Basque language, in which I was at the time interested. I thought it improbable that Basque books should have travelled so far south, but I cannot confirm or deny the rumour; for there is no subject-catalogue, and without one it is impossible to make a thorough search. The Basque books shown to me were familiar and are noted in Prof. Vinson's Bibliographie. The library contains no Basque translation of any portion of the Holy Scriptures (although the collection of Biblia Sacra in many languages is very large), except a copy of the fragment of the earliest translation of Genesis, which I was allowed to present. Disappointed in my quest, I turned to the fine collection of illuminated MSS., over one of which I spent much time, as will be shown in my next letter to the ACADEMY. But, to pass from merely personal reminiscences, the Bibliotheca stands in the heart of the city and is its only public library in the ordinary acceptance of the term. As I indicated above, the conventual buildings are admirably suited for their present use, and the long corridors, lined with books, have a very impressive appearance. The number of volumes was estimated in 1887 to be 200,000, but it must now be much greater. On the whole, the institution is excellently managed. There must always be some difficulty when a learned and a popular library exist under one roof. A long low room, once the refectory, forms the public reading-room. This is very similar to the free libraries so common in most of our large towns. There is a slip catalogue, and books are supplied to the readers with fair promptitude. The chief frequenters of the room are youths thirsting for romances, artisans seeking works on popular science, &c., and journalists in want of books of reference. At any rate that was my impression; but it is not safe to dogmatise on this subject, for a record is kept of all the books supplied, and is published from time to time in the Lisbon newspapers. There is always an official presiding in the room, good order and tolerable silence are observed, and continental politeness is strictly enforced—for instance, if an unwary visitor enters without doffing his hat he is immediately requested to remove it.

After traversing several corridors, and mounting two or three flights of stone stairs, we gain access to the chambers in which the rarer books and MSS. are preserved.

Below all is life and bustle, but here reign solitude and silence. In the three months during which I frequented this library, the visits of students were few and far between. Occasionally a few fidalgos might be seen consulting the genealogical and heraldic records of the Nobreza Portuguesa (in which the library is very rich), or an ecclesiastic poring over a ponderous tome; but such sights are rare. At no time did I see anything like systematic study. Allowance must, as above, be made for the languor of the summer season; something, too, must be said about the inconvenience of the hours. The library is not opened until noon, and is closed at four o'clock; thus the precious hours of morning light are lost: and when it is recollected that in hot countries the chief meal always occurs in the middle of the day, it will be admitted that only severer students can be expected to avail themselves of the full time permissible. It is true that the popular reading-room is opened again for two or three hours at 8 p.m., but it is evidently undesirable that the upper chambers should be illuminated by artificial light.

A minor inconvenience is caused by the uncertainty whether the library will on any particular day be open or not. For instance, on the occurrence of a State funeral or a royal birthday it is irritating to the foreigner to find in locked doors the first intimation that he must intermit his studies for the day. Another slight inconvenience may be mentioned. As I said above, the Bibliotheca occupies a portion only of the convent; the rest of the building is a police-station, and beneath some of the reading-rooms are the cells or cages in which malefactors are confined when awaiting their trial. As is well known, the Portuguese have the peculiar custom of keeping their prisoners as it were in public, and free access of friends and foes is permitted. Thus lively scenes are witnessed from the windows, and strange noises arise from below, which are out of harmony with the traditions of the building and distracting to the most diligent reader.

It is now time to speak of the treasures of the Bibliotheca Nacional. They are considerable, being the spoils of the chief monasteries in Portugal. Perhaps the most extensive and valuable collection is that which came from the great Monastery of Alcobaça. The whole library, and even the quaint bookcases, were transferred to Lisbon; and the fine room in which they were formerly kept, with a Latin inscription inviting to study still conspicuous over the doorway, is now degraded to be the dormitory of a cavalry barracks.

The books are apparently dispersed throughout the Bibliotheca, but the MSS. are not divided; they are numerous and interesting, and of them there exists (what is so rare in Portugal) a printed catalogue. Besides the wealth of monasteries, we find here private collections bequeathed by their former owners. Among these is the library of the Marquis of Pombal, who had ample opportunities of collecting rare works. Much also of his correspondence is here preserved. I will only mention among the English letters an amusing one from W. Julius Mickle, in which that early translator of Camoens laments that the unfortunate Portuguese poet was not born later that he might have enjoyed the discriminating patronage of the great Minister of Joseph II. Of course a room is devoted to Camoens and decorated with his bust; here may be seen MSS. and early printed editions of his poems and translations of them into almost every European language. One is tempted to say something of the many English translations, but this letter is already too long and the temptation must for the present be resisted.

In estimating the treasures and possibilities of such a library as I am describing, the foreigner is much at a loss in selecting what is most characteristic; but in looking through the old written catalogue, I was struck by the apparent extent and variety of the collections of Portuguese poetry and popular songs reported to exist in MS. Your contributor Mr. Wentworth Webster, whose interest and researches in the folk-lore and literature of Southern France and Spain are so well known, informs me that valuable work might be done in critically comparing the popular poetry of Spain and Portugal. His opinion is, that the songs of Portugal are more perfect in metrical form and rhythm, while those of Spain are superior in poetical merit. He attributes this to a difference of style and instruments of music in the two countries. It appears to me that the materials for such a comparison exist partly in this library. The person who should make it would require a thorough knowledge of the languages, and even of the dialects of the Peninsula; but, happily, such knowledge is not rare even among English residents in Lisbon.

It would be wrong to close this account of the Bibliotheca Nacional without gratefully acknowledging the uniform kindness, courtesy, and attention of the director—Senhor Pereira —and his assistants. The library could not, under present conditions, be better administered.

Before concluding I must mention one library which is not, but ought to be, in Lisbon. It is the library of the palace and ex-monastery of Mafra. Although not very distant from the capital, Mafra is off the line of railway and is practically inaccessible to readers. The library is kept in a fine hall paved with red and white marble, the walls are lined with bookcases of costly foreign woods, the shelves of which are well filled with volumes, many of them gorgeously bound. A white gallery runs round the room, the walls and ceiling of which are decorated with stucco ornaments after the manner of the eighteenth century. Oxford readers may form an idea of its appearance if I add that it is not unlike the old library at Blenheim Palace, but larger. Nobody would wish to remove the books from such a home, if its original custodians remained to guard them. But now these books are not only useless but also insecure, and signs of neglect are daily becoming more apparent.

The library is said to contain 30,000 volumes, but the MSS. are not numerous and are chiefly of an ecclesiastical character. There would be ample room for the collection in the Bibliotheca Nacional, if accommodation for the howling malefactors were found elsewhere.

THE DATE OF THE "APOLOGY" OF JUSTIN MARTYR.

British Museum: Jan. 27, 1896.

The precise date of Justin Martyr's Apologia pro Christianis is a matter of some interest, and it has been very variously fixed by different writers. In the Encyclopædia Britannica it is placed between 138 and 140 A.D. Prof. Hort at one time assigned it to about 146 A.D., and in his recently published Lectures on the Ante-Nicene Fathers dates it "two or three years before the middle of the century"; while the latest editor, Dr. Veil, places it between 153 and 155 A.D. It therefore seems worth while to call attention to a piece of evidence which tends to provide a more definite terminus a quo.

In chap. xxix. Justin refers to a recent event in which a prefect of Egypt, named Felix, was concerned: καὶ ἦδη τις τῶν ἡμετέρων . . . βαλὼν ἀνέβηκεν ἐν Ἀλεξανδρίᾳ φήλακι ἡγεμονεύοντι, κ.τ.λ. Now this Felix, whose full name appears to have been Lucius Munatius Felix, is mentioned in a papyrus in the British Museum (No. 66018) as the successor of M. Petronius Honoratus, who is shown by a Berlin papyrus (No. 265) to have been prefect in 148 A.D. The exact date at which Felix succeeded Honoratus cannot be fixed; but his period of office had certainly come to an end before August, 154 A.D., when M. Sempronius Liberalis appears as prefect (Berl. Papp. 26, 372). Honoratus was at the beginning of his term of office in 148 A.D., so that it is not probable that Felix can be placed earlier than 150 A.D. Justin's language is not definite enough to enable us to say how long before the time of his Apology the incident of which he speaks took place; but it is clear that the Apology can no longer be assigned to any very early year in the reign of Antoninus Pius, and that the dates given by Harnack (152-154 A.D.) and Veil (153-155 A.D.) are approximately correct.

THE FORM "FRIAR."

Oxford: Jan. 23, 1896.

In English words derived from the French the sound f (as in ice) is a very common development in Modern English of an older e sound

(as in French été), when this e is preceded or followed by the sound of r. There is therefore nothing irregular in the representation of Old-French and Middle-English frere by the form "friar" in Modern English. Compare "quire" = Middle-English quere, Old-French quer, Latin chōrum; "enquire" = Middle-English enquere, Old-French enquerre, Popular Latin enquētere, Latin in + quærere; "squire" = Old-French esquerre (Mod. équerre), Popular Latin exquadra; "umpire" = Middle-English noun-pere, Old-French nonper, Latin non + parrin. Compare the obsolete forms rampire and camphire, for older rampere and camphere, representing Old-French rempar and camfre. See on this point a letter of mine in the ACADEMY, No. 818.

The same development of sound is found occasionally when the r precedes. The clearest case is that of "contrive," the Middle-English form of which was contreve, which represents the true base of Old-French trover, Popular Latin trōpare (as "beef" = Old-French boef, Latin bōvem; and "people" = Old-French pueple, Latin pōpulum). With this we may compare "trifle," a common Middle-English form of which was treffe (trefele) which occurs in "Piers Plowman," the e of which represents an Old-French treufte, a dialect pronunciation of truffe, "truffle." "Briar" (= Old-English brær, brær) and "tire" (= Old-English teran, "to tear," "to tire") show a like development of sound in English words. In this way we may explain "fry" for Middle-English frī, Icelandic frá, "seed."

SCIENCE.

THE ARMENIAN VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Texts and Studies of Euthalian, No. 2. By J. Armitage Robinson, D.D., Norrisian Professor of Divinity in Cambridge. (Cambridge: University Press.)

In this work Prof. Robinson devotes three chapters to Euthalius, "the first Masorete of the New Testament"; one to Codex H of the Paulines; one to the Armenian Version and its supposed relation to the Paulines.

In many Greek MSS., and in the Armenian Version of the New Testament, we have prologues to the Pauline Epistles, to the Acts, and to the Catholic Epistles, tables of lections and of quotations occurring in them; summaries of the Acts chapter by chapter, also of the Epistles, &c. The net result of Prof. Robinson's examination is to deprive Euthalius of the authorship of some of this work traditionally ascribed to him, and in particular of the piece called the Martyrium Pauli, which, if it were really by Euthalius, would fix the date of his first work on the Paulines at 396 A.D. This Martyrium, however, is so much in the style of the undoubtedly genuine prologues that Prof. Robinson supposes it to be an intentional imitation of them. But this is very disputable; and I do not think that the inelegant mannerisms of Euthalius' style would be imitated by another. The question, too, always remains: Why should a later writer, desirous of adding before the Paulines an account of Paul's martyrdom, have troubled himself to imitate Euthalius in so many subtle ways? To this Prof. Robinson gives no satisfactory answer.

On pp. 50-65 are printed several pages of Codex H, which Prof. Robinson has for the first time deciphered. In chap. v., "On the Relation of the Armenian Version to Euthalius," he rejects the conclusion which the present reviewer had arrived at, that the Armenian Version of the Paulines directly represents the text of Pamphilus of Caesarea; and he shows that that conclusion was based on too narrow a basis of induction. But it is in connexion with this point that Prof. Robinson contributes new information of the most important kind. Attempts have been made to prove that the text of the Syriac Gospels lately found at Sinai is not one out of which the Peshito was afterwards developed, but is a degenerate form of the Peshito itself. If such a view be true, the Sinaitic text has no value as a very primitive form of text. Here Prof. Robinson steps in, and shows that in numerous instances the Armenian has a text found nowhere except in Syr<sup>sin</sup>. Therefore the early Syriac text from which the Armenian was originally made was a text closely akin to the one found by Mrs. Lewis.

It is related by Moses of Chorene that the Armenian Fathers revised the Armenian Bible early in the fifth century from Greek MSS. brought from Constantinople. The earlier version so revised had been made by St. Sahak from Syriac. Prof. Robinson's discovery in the Armenian of old Syriac elements might, therefore, have been expected. The question remains: What was the date of this earlier Armenian Version? If we are to believe the account of Moses of Chorene, that St. Sahak made it, it will fall as late as about 400 A.D. But Moses is not so good a witness as Goriun and Lazar of Pharpi, who declare that St. Sahak translated from Greek; and in the face of their evidence we must reject the account of Moses, except so far as the latter attests that the earliest Armenian Version was made from Syriac. An Armenian writer of the seventh century, Theodor Khrthenawor, supplies us with the information we want. In a treatise written against an Armenian sect of Docetic heretics or Cathari (printed at Venice in 1833), he says that these sectaries declared that the "first Armenian translation" of the New Testament should not be received, because it contained verses 43 and 44 of Luke, chap. xxii., in which it is related that Jesus was comforted by an angel and sweated drops of blood. They also said that Gregory the Illuminator had not quoted these verses in his Commentary on the Lord's Passion. Theodor, in his answer, admits that the objectionable verses stood in the first version, but in regard to St. Gregory he raises a twofold contention: (1) That he had quoted the Third Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, and so given to it the weight of his testimony, this although the Nicene Fathers only admitted into the Canon to be read in church two pentads and one tetrad in number of Paul's Epistles. The 3 Corinthians, says Theodor, was included in the old edition (of the Armenian New Testament), but is not in the new recension of it. "If it be rejected," says Theodor, "and excluded from the Church because it is not reproduced in the newly circulated translations of the older gospel, you, in so rejecting it, censure St. Gregory." (2) St. Gregory in his commentary took the verses of the Gospels—not according to the complete evangelic order of the chapters—and put them together in such an arrangement as best suited the simplicity of those whom he taught.

The drift of the first of these arguments is not quite clear; but it apparently means that, just as the Nicene Council ignored an Epistle of Paul which is yet to be received on the authority of St. Gregory, so St. Gregory might ignore Luke xxii. 43, 44, without really prejudicing the authenticity of these verses. The drift of the second argument is clear. It is that Gregory had the verses in his translation of the Gospels, and only did not quote them because it did not suit his methods of exposition to do so.

The implications of these arguments of Theodor are very important. They are these:

(A) There was an Armenian Version, at least of the New Testament, as early as the days of St. Gregory—i.e., almost at the beginning of the fourth century.

(B) This version comprised not merely the Gospels, but the Paulines as well. Otherwise 3 Cor. would not have formed part of it.

(C) This early Version was made from Syriac; for it contained 3 Cor., which stood in the Syriac canon and in no other.

These three conclusions tally exactly with the plain traces—pointed out by Prof. Robinson—of the oldest Syriac Version both in the Armenian Gospels and in the Paulines. But more than this, if an Armenian Version, made as early as, say, 325 from Syriac, was made from a text closely akin to Syr<sup>sin</sup>, it follows that such a text must have been (a) much older than 325 A.D., and (β) must have been the text officially received at that older time in the Syriac Church. It would seem that the Peshito text had not yet been formed, and that in the method of its subsequent formation and development it resembled the second Armenian Version, which alone survives to us.

It remains to point out that the Armenian is not the only version which has traces of the older Syriac text. For the Georgian Version has many similar ones—e.g., it renders Mc. vii. 19, Εἰς τὸν ἀφ' ὧν ἐκπορεύεται thus: "It goeth out with a going out." In Mc. viii. 4 it renders, "whence canst thou satisfy." In Rom. v. 8 it = "God manifested his love." In 1 Cor. iv. 12 it agrees with the Armenian in rendering the passive participles by active ones. In 2 Cor. v. 10 it practically gives the same text as the Armenian, which here follows the reading of Ephrem and Aphrahat. It has the same rendering as the Armenian in Rom. xi. 26, Rom. xiii. 11, 1 Cor. ix. 13, 1 Cor. ix. 15 (similar only), 2 Cor. x. 11. In 1 Cor. x. 24 it adds μόνον. In 1 Cor. xi. 19 it has "divisions are about to be." Prof. Robinson thinks that the Armenian rendering of John iv. 31—"And while they were not yet come, the disciples were beseeching Him and saying, Rabbi, eat bread"—is peculiar to that version. But the Georgian also equals: "But while they were not yet come [or until they were come] during this speech [i.e., ἐν τῇ μεράτῃ] his disciples addressed him, and said, Rabbi, eat." In Matt. v. 18 also the Georgian adds Καὶ τῶν προφητῶν, with the Ferrar group of Greek MSS.

In the above I have only tested the Georgian for the older readings noticed as in the Armenian, by Prof. Robinson; but they are adducible by scores from this little-known version, which, like the Armenian, seems to have been originally based on an old Syriac text and afterwards remodelled according to Greek MSS. But whereas the remodelling of the Armenian was done by Sahak and Mesrop early in the fifth century, that of the Georgian was possibly as late as St. Euthymius, who died 1026, having made his new recension of the Georgian Bible in Mount Athos where he was Abbot. I look forward with confidence to finding, either at Athos or Sinai, or in Jerusalem, or in Tiflis, a Georgian New Testament earlier than this recension; and then we shall have a fresh clue to the nature of the earliest Syriac text. It is not improbable that old copies of Georgian lectionaries and liturgies would also aid us in recovering the earliest Georgian text.

A comparison of the Georgian text of the Paulines with the Armenian and Peshito, and of all three with Ephrem's commentary, proves that the Armenian and Georgian were translated from the Syriac text used by Ephrem. For in hundreds of cases they agree with Ephrem against the Peshito; and practically never agree with the Peshito without the assent of Ephrem (that is, wherever Ephrem's reading can be ascertained). It follows that the agreement of Armenian and Georgian, or of either of them with Syr<sup>sin</sup>, represents Ephrem's Syriac. The lineaments of the original Syriac have in the Georgian been less revised away than in the Armenian.

It is not impossible that many readings of the primitive or unrevised Armenian text may be lurking in their older writers. Theodor adduces what appears to be a citation from it: "The house of the giant is not plundered, unless first the strong man be bound." These words, he says, the heretics put into the mouth of Christ. The corresponding text of Syr<sup>sin</sup> is lost; but we may note the primitive ring of this citation, which reads like an echo of some folk-story, pressed by Jesus into the service of His parable.

AN ANCIENT BAUDD'A TILE.

Muswell Hill, N. : Jan. 18, 1896.

It may interest Aryan scholars to know that I have received from Burma an ancient Baudd'a tile, found at Tagoung, on the Irrawadi, which centuries ago was the capital of the country, and whence the religion of S'akja Muni was first introduced into Burma. The sculpture represents Gautama, the Budd'a, in the "witness" attitude, with Śāriputra on one side and Maugdjalājana on the other. Underneath the figures is an inscription in characters midway between those found in Kutila and in Assam. So far as I know, it is the only instance of the use of these letters in Burma. For the decipherment of the inscription I am indebted to my friend Don de Zilva Wickremasinha. It is the celebrated stanza by which Assag'i received the above-named disciples into the Saṃ'ga, namely:

"Jā d'ammā hetuppab'avā tēsam hētum Tat'āgatō āhā, Tēsaṃ k'a jō nīrōd'ō ēvam vādi Mahāsamanō."

Now it is a noteworthy fact that the Sanskrit form of this Pāli stanza was the first original Baudd'a text on religious monuments discovered in India. In 1835 it was read for the first time by Prinsep on the pedestal of a mutilated statue of the Budd'a found in the ruins of an ancient city near Bak'ra. Since then a sculpture of Gautama in the "witness" attitude, of the eleventh century, has been found in the western portion of the temple at Budd'a Gajā, and the Sanskrit form has also been discovered on a stone taken from the excavations of the Stūpa of Sārnā't. It is as follows:

"Jā d'armā hētu-prab'avāś tē'sām hētum Tat'ā-gata uvāk'a, Tē'sām K'a jō nīrōd'a ēvām vādi Mahā S'ram-anā!"

When he first heard of Prinsep's discovery Cosma de Cōrīs remembered having frequently met with the stanza in Tibetan books (see Burnouf, Le Lotus de la bonne Loi, p. 523).

To the Burmese these words constitute a real summary of the Tat'āgata's teaching, so I venture to translate them conceptually rather than literally:

"'Tis he proclaims our being's rise,
Of ceaseless life the ebb and flow;
'Tis he, the great Tat'āgatā,
Who trod the Path and taught release,
Foretook the world for perfect peace,
And preached the noble verities!"

PHOENICIAN INSCRIPTIONS FROM CYPRUS.

Mansfield College, Oxford: Jan. 21, 1896.

Mr. Cooke draws attention to the use of the divine names Rahmun and Melqarth as personal proper names in the inscriptions published by him in the ACADEMY of January 16. This usage by itself would lend an interest to these inscriptions; for, though not unknown, it is rare. Instances, including Rahmun and Melqarth, are cited by Bloch (Phoen. Glossar, p. 16). Rahmun, in Mr. Cooke's first inscription, clearly seems to be a genuine instance of the usage. Melqarth, in the third inscription, is more questionable.

If מלך at the beginning of the inscription be rightly deciphered and translated "his lord," a proper name should immediately follow; I would propose, therefore, to translate, "his lord, Ben-Melqarth, the son of Mikal." There is a good deal of analogy for compound names of the type Ben-Melqarth: that is, of names in which the word "son" is followed by the name of a deity. Thus, we find in Aramaic ברנבו (De Vogüé, Syrie Centrale, 73), ברערא, Bar-Hadad, Bar-lāhā (Transactions of the Soc. of Bibl. Arch., vol. vi., p. 438), perhaps the Biblical ברוך; but ברנבו is probably only an apparent example. I am not aware of a Phoenician instance beginning with בן, but the parallel feminine form בת בעל is common; see, e.g., C. I. S. 727, בת בעלחט, where, it will be observed, בת is first used as part of the proper name Bath-Ba'al (cf. Ben-Melqarth), and then in its ordinary sense, daughter of Baal-Hanno (cf. son of Mikal)—and, further, Nos. 775, 792, 887. Thus, if my interpretation be correct, the inscription is of considerable interest as furnishing the masculine parallel, hitherto undiscovered in Phoenician, to the common feminine בת בעל = Bath-Ba'al.

THE AMERICAN PSYCHOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.

We quote the following from the New York Nation:

"The meeting of the American Psychological Association in Philadelphia during the holidays was a notable one, chiefly because it was the first joint meeting with the American Naturalists. The psychologists have not affiliated with the naturalists formally, but their meeting with them this year was so evidently to their advantage that it may well be their settled policy hereafter. The rapprochement between psychology and biology was celebrated in a special way on Saturday morning (December 28), when the whole half-day was given up to a set discussion on 'Consciousness and Evolution,' in which well-known speakers on both sides took part. The size of the audience and the presence of representatives from other societies showed the general interest the topic aroused. The speakers for biology were Prof. Cope of Philadelphia and Prof. Minot of Boston, and the psychologists on the programme were Prof. James of Harvard and Prof. Baldwin of Princeton. Besides these, others also spoke from the floor, notably Prof. Ladd of Yale and Prof. Strong of Chicago. In all the speeches the reality of the alliance between the two branches of inquiry was abundantly evident, and this may be made clearer from the mere statement of two positions which seemed to be assumed by the speakers generally. In the first place, there seemed to be no question in any one's mind as to the application of the evolution doctrine to consciousness. It was taken for granted that genetic psychology sets a problem of race-growth in the same way that genetic or evolutionary biology does; and secondly, it was about equally clear from the utterances of the two biologists and of one at least of the psychologists (Prof. Baldwin), that the two sciences are coming to think that their historical ground is common in all its extent—i.e., that consciousness is co-ordinate with life. Two important steps were taken by the psychologists looking toward enlarged activity. A committee was appointed to consider the matter of formulating a series of mental and physical tests to be made on students in the colleges—the idea being to secure material for practical utility to the teaching profession, and also to reach scientific results of a statistical kind. The other move was made in the direction of forming a section for philosophical discussion. This latter matter, however, was left in the hands of the executive council for report at the next meeting. Abstracts of the proceedings, together with the debate on 'Consciousness and Evolution' in full, are to appear in the Psychological Review for March."

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

VIKING CLUB.—(Friday, Jan. 10.)

THE Rev. A. Sandison, president, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. Gilbert Goudie on "The Norsemen in Shetland." The paper was not intended to trace in historical sequence the incidents from age to age of the Scandinavian occupation of the Shetland Isles, but to catch the salient features of that occupation with a view to determining whether and to what extent the race and racial qualities of the Norsemen have continued in those islands to the present day. The conquest and settlement of the Isles by the Norsemen in the end of the ninth century, and the absorption, rather than the extinction, of their Celtic predecessors, were first referred to, after which the distinctive features of Scandinavian life and polity were sketched—the growth of the Odal (or "Udal," as termed in Orkney and Shetland) system of land tenure as contrasted with the feudalism elsewhere prevailing in Western Europe; the consequent freedom and independence of the people under a code of native laws; and the settlement, in accordance with those laws, of succession to heritable and movable estate by a Shuynd Court, whose decision recorded in a Shuynd Bill was held as determinative; the equal division among heirs (with a reduced "sisters' part"), the law of primogeniture as affecting succession to property being practically unknown; the very perfect system of local government, under the charge of the "Great Foud" of Shetland (Norse Foged), whose head Court (the Althing) met at the Loch of Tingwall once a year or oftener, as public circumstances demanded, all the "freeborn" inhabitants being members, with equal voice and vote, and the functions of the Court both legislative and judicial; the subordinate parochial courts under the Parish Fouds, with officials termed "Lanrightmen" (Ligrettemenn), to represent the rights and interests of the people—the whole system very closely resembling the administrative system formerly, and to a large extent to this day, prevailing in Norway. These local institutions, constituted under the native laws, which were closely akin to those of Norway, continued with marked persistency long after the Orkney and Shetland Isles were pledged to Scotland under the contract of marriage between Margaret of Denmark and King James III., in 1468, under which redeemable title the islands are still held by Great Britain. But it was pointed out that the subversion of these local laws and institutions, and their assimilation to Scottish forms, became a gradual system under the Earls of the Royal House of Stewart from shortly after the Reformation in Scotland, and about the middle of the sixteenth century, and was pursued with equal persistency by their successors. Notwithstanding the loss in this way of their native laws and ancient freedom, the islanders continued to cherish the language, the spirit, and the traditions of their forefathers; and it was explained by what aggregation of evidence—racial, linguistic, documentary, as well as by survivals in the local nomenclature, and in social and domestic forms and usages—it was justifiable to assert that, as in former ages, the Norsemen were the conquerors and colonisers of the Shetland Isles; so their descendants in the Isles at the present day are, if lightly disguised, yet none the less true and genuine Norsemen.—Mr. F. T. Norris said that he had been much gratified by this paper on a remote part of Great Britain, the details of which might afford matter for consideration. It was a pity no quotations had been given by the writer from the Norse documents and poems mentioned, and that he had not instanced any of the place-names to which he referred. As it was, the paper could only be regarded as an outline for more extended studies, which he hoped Mr. Goudie would undertake, especially with regard to the place-names, which are so rapidly disappearing.—Mr. A. W. Johnston remarked, with regard to Mr. Goudie having taken it for granted that the Picts were Celts, that there were many scholars, such as

Karl Blind, who maintained that the Picts were a Teutonic race, with fair hair and blue eyes. An interesting point with regard to the Norwegian government of the islands was that the Earl of Orkney had to undertake their defence at his own cost, on which account he did not have to contribute any tax to the King of Norway, his nominal sovereign, as had to be done by the Earls in Norway itself. With regard to the pledging of the sovereignty of the islands by Norway, Orkney was first pledged by special treaty, and, there not being sufficient money to pay the remainder of the Princess's dowry, Shetland was likewise pledged, but without any treaty being apparently drawn up. The old Schynd Court, which granted a Bill to each successor to an Udal holding, has ceased to exist, so that at present Udalers have no proper legal method of making up their title to their heritages, an anomaly which calls for rectification. The speaker called attention to Sir George Dasent's theory, that the islands were empty and desolate when the Norsemen first invaded them, and that it was not before their swords that the ancient inhabitants disappeared: a theory which he drew from the fact that the Sagas are silent on the subject of conflicts. Mr. Johnston also pointed out that the "oolie" or old black lamp was still in use, and that he had recently acquired one in Orkney, as well as an iron mould in which one had been made last year. — Mr. W. F. Kirby said that there seemed to be very considerable doubt as to who the Picts were. A recent writer had put forward the opinion that they were a Finnish race, who preceded the Norsemen in the countries they inhabited. — Mr. Norris said he favoured the view that the Picts were early Norsemen, their name and their exploits, as represented in the Irish Annals, resembling those of the Vikings of later years. — Mr. A. F. Major said that if the last speaker meant that the names "Pict" and "Viking" were akin, some evidence besides the possibility under phonetic laws of the p and b interchanging was desirable, and he hoped Mr. Norris would develop his views on some future occasion. With regard to criticisms on Mr. Goudie's paper, it should be observed that it was only a summary of studies, the details of which Mr. Goudie had for the most part already given to the world in various papers. — The Rev. John Spence said that Shetland as a whole was very dear to him, and he was sorry that he had not come prepared to discuss the subject at length. He also regretted that Mr. Goudie had not entered into fuller detail: light upon the place-names especially would have been most valuable. He hoped, however, that Mr. Goudie would favour the club again on the subject. He himself, as a Shetlander, had navigated the islands in every part, and knew every rock and headland round the coasts, and the whole country inland as well. He had also travelled all the world over, and knew and loved people of all nations; but he was bound to say that his heart always retained a special love for "the old rock" and its inhabitants above all others, and therefore the chance of being present that night had been very welcome to him. — The president said that if to-night we had missed something of the detail we might have desired, it arose, he thought, from the fulness of the lecturer's knowledge of his subject and his fear to overload it with details. Shetlanders could probably fill in for themselves many of the gaps, but possibly others who were not connected with the islands would have appreciated the lecture better had fuller details been given. He felt much interest in the problem of the Pictish inhabitants; for though Mr. Goudie said they were probably absorbed, local tradition in North Shetland at any rate said very decidedly that they were exterminated after long and desperate fighting; and to this he inclined, in spite of the opinion of Sir G. W. Dasent, quoted by Mr. Johnston, that they had previously left the islands, as no warfare is recorded in the Sagas. In Unst there was a tradition that the warfare continued till the only surviving Picts were a priest and his son. Their one possession of value was a knowledge of the way to brew heather-beer. The Norse invaders, coveting this secret, offered their captives their lives in return for the knowledge of it. The priest consented to teach it them on condition that they first slew his son. When this deed was done he defied them, and carried the secret with him to his grave. So for good or ill the art of brewing beer out of heather was lost to the world. It was a question whether there was any real survival of Celtic names in Shetland. If there were none, the fact supported the view that the Picts had been exterminated, not absorbed, assuming that they had not been destroyed by pestilence. If we may judge from many other instances, place-names have such wondrous vitality that many of them must have survived, had the earlier inhabitants been absorbed. This was especially the case in a country like Shetland, where every feature in the landscape, each stone along the shore, every rock and skerry, even to the reefs below the surface, every knoll and dell, even to a dimple on a hill side, had a local name describing it. These names, however, were fast dying out; and for this the curse of the lovers of the past will rest on the Scotch schoolmasters and the officers of the Ordnance Survey. The schoolmasters transformed and explained away the names they were too ignorant to understand; and the Survey officials took down the local nomenclature from the lips of the most talkative, and therefore generally of the most ignorant, people. He was afraid, too, that the ministers, or many of them, would have also to stand in the pillory for the destruction they had wrought in their crusade against superstition. However, he was glad to say that the researches of Mr. Jacob Jacobson had aroused much interest, and there was some hope that the process of destruction would be arrested. He himself had heard in use almost all the personal names mentioned by Mr. Goudie, and he thought that the Norse forms still persisted, the forms given as corruptions being pet names or diminutives. It had been very interesting to him, when visiting Norway some years ago, to find that sea-faring terms used by the fishermen and boatmen, and also the peasants' names for flowers and plants, were practically identical in Shetland and Norway. As regards the prospect of the Norse element in the islands continuing, it must be borne in mind that Shetlanders have a wonderful faculty of absorbing other races, and even Scotchmen and their descendants settled in the islands soon become Shetlanders in feeling and develop a true insular hatred of everything Scotch. This hatred of Scotchmen was doubtless partly due to the fact that the ministers, schoolmasters, and lairds, classes all likely at one time or another to arouse animosity, were Scotch. As regards the landholders being mainly of Scotch descent, the way in which the native Udalers were rooted out and their lands acquired by foreigners made a very shameful record. In his boyhood Prince Lucien Bonaparte had visited the islands on the same errand as Dr. Jacobson, and stayed with his father. The Prince's opinion was that the language in Shetland had never been a pure Norse tongue. Ecclesiastical buildings abounded; and this was especially so in the case of small chapels dating from Roman Catholic times, which were so frequent along the coast, all now in ruins. The ancient dykes referred to by Mr. Goudie were a noticeable feature in the landscape, and were remarkable. They exist only in outline, and are broken by many gaps. When used for division walls, if they were ever so used, they must have been constructed for the most part of turf. Possibly they were never intended to do more than indicate the delimitations of different townships. In conclusion, he would only refer to one more legend, that of the so-called New Kirk in Unst, of which the story ran that it had never been finished, for whatever the builders built by day the Picts came and destroyed by night, till at last the task was given up in despair. From careful examination of it, and calculation as to the amount of material remaining in the walls and ruins (there being little reason to suppose that the stones had been removed for other purposes), he thought that the story of its never being finished was true, and even that there might be some truth in the legend told about it. Close to the ruin there were the remains of a stone circle, perfect on the far side, though on the near side the stones had evidently been removed. (Query, to build the church?) On the under side of the church was a green mound, into which he had dug, discovering many fragments of pottery, calcined bones, heather charcoal and white, sea-worn pebbles, which (Mr.

Anderson told him) were associated with interments where the dead had been burned. His conclusion was that the building dated from early Christian times; and that a burial-place and place of meeting held sacred in heathen days had been chosen as its site, possibly out of the spirit of monkish fanaticism that led to the desecration of heathen shrines in other parts also. But many of the people, though perhaps outwardly Christian, still cherished their old beliefs, and, angered by the sacrilege, came by night to undo the builders' work till their superstitious fears led them to abandon it.

ASIATIC.—(Tuesday, Jan. 14.)

THE Rev. Dr. Gaster in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. George Phillips (late China Consular Service) on "Mahuan's Account of Cochim, Calicut, and Aden in the Fifteenth Century." The description of these countries from the pen of a Chinaman showed the traveller to have been a close observer of what he had actually seen. Treating of Cochim, he gave a description of the various classes of that country, such as the Nairs, Chettis, and Klings, and also of the Yagis. The cultivation of pepper was spoken of, and a list given of the coins and of the weights and measures in use there. Calicut was described as a large trading mart, and a seat of cotton manufacture. Nepotism and trial by ordeal were touched upon. Mention was made of a stone pillar erected on the beach at Calicut in 1408. Nothing appeared to be known of such a pillar by any member present at the meeting. Aden was described as possessing a military force of seven or eight thousand men, which made it feared and respected by its neighbours. This was in 1422. The traveller, after describing the dress of the ruler and people, and giving a list of the fruits to be obtained there, gave a most accurate description of the zebra, the giraffe, and the Aden sheep. It is evident that intercourse between China, India, and Arabia was somewhat extensive at this period. — A discussion followed, in which Dr. Codrington, Mr. Walhouse, Mr. Baynes, and Dr. Gaster took part.

FINE ART. OBITUARY.

LORD LEIGHTON.

It is not an easy task to respond to the request of the editor of the ACADEMY, and to furnish to a weekly paper—when the large dailies have already had their say—some slight record or impression of a great painter and a great Academic President, whose character and the character of whose work have both impressed themselves so deeply upon the art-life of the day. The time for the fulfilment of that invidious, yet some day necessary, task, the "placing" of Lord Leighton in what may appear to be his proper rack in English painting and design, has not yet come; and the time has gone already for expressing, with the fulness of emotion natural to the first hours of a profound and general mourning, the sense of the loss that has been suffered. Moreover, those biographical details which are at the disposal of writers have already been made public; and it would be but to tell a twice-told tale did we recount again the incidents of an artistic career often eminently triumphant, and hardly once chequered by absolute failure. A few essential things—and these alone—shall be pointed out, and in the indication of them it will be vain even to endeavour to be novel.

A word, then, first for Leighton as an artist; and a word afterwards for him as a man and leader of men. His successes began early, with the "Procession of Cimabue"; and while he was only a middle-aged man he was proclaimed old-fashioned by striplings, who brought from the studios of Paris some modern knowledge of "values" and a devotion to the "square touch," which yet has not resulted in making them the accepted successors of Velasquez. The artistic estimate formed of Leighton at the various stages of his career was a consequence, in part, of the artistic conditions of the respective periods. When, save in MacIise and Mulready, fine draughtsmanship was rare, the draughtsmanship of Leighton was able to gain him yet greater commendation for that particular quality than he could have asked or expected to-day; and when, save in William Etty, and it may be in Paul Falconer Poole, excellence and affluence of colour were rare possessions in English painting, the colouring of Leighton, whose first works were shown when one at least of these men was yet at work, permitted him to wield a fascination which was in any case unusual. And if in later years, without perceptible declension on his own part, the art of Leighton won scantier approval, that was partly because the noisy and cocksure opponents of his particular practice had persuaded themselves—and a few of the weaker brethren along with themselves—that the greatest and most characteristic quality of Leighton's art, the noble deliberation and intricate completeness of its design, was a quality which could well be dispensed with, if we got, instead of design or beauty at all, the vulgar verisimilitude of the photographed fragment.

As a painter, Leighton, of course, had his defects or deficiencies, which it needs no ingenuity to point out. The texture of his flesh was sometimes porcelain-like; its hues were at times leathery. The type of man he was fondest of was, at least, not the most virile; the type of woman, though endowed with a luxurious beauty, may have been at the best but sedative—she was oriental; she was uninspiring. But the draughtsmanship was never petty nor wanting in decisiveness; the effect was always decorative; the modelling was accustomed to be nobly sculptural; and, above all, the sense of design was unflinching and dominant. In the larger work of Leighton he was a magnificent decorator. In the smaller, if perchance it was a sketch from nature in the South, or a first thought (which the South inspired) for an important composition, he attained not only the qualities which I have just praised him for, but, to boot, a noble balance of colour, the full and the impulsive employment of a Venetian palette. And never, whether he succeeded most or least, had his art any symptom of the commonplace. Where he succeeded least, he fell short of triumph only because of the dignity and range of his endeavour. He would be classical now, and now romantic, but he never would be ordinary.

As a President of the Royal Academy, those even who liked his work not at all—those, for instance, who ignorantly boast that it has nothing to say to them—admit his pre-eminence. He was the immediate successor of an agreeable man of the world, whose social qualifications Leighton immediately equalled, and whose width of artistic sympathies he immediately surpassed. But those virtues of Lord Leighton which fitted him so greatly for the fulfilment of official functions are known at present to everybody, and need not for a moment be insisted on. It has long, indeed, been matter of everyday report that he was diligent in business, of unvarying and stately courtesy, having immunity from jealousies—as every artist, in whatever art must have, if his soul is set upon excellence in his pursuit—and being extraordinarily helpful, with counsel and with money, to those whose deserts brought them at all within the range of his legitimate concern. That he was, besides all this, a distinguished and worthy courtier; something of a diplomatist, if need were; a linguist wholly exceptional, not so much for actual dry knowledge of the foreign tongues, as for the elegance with which he employed them; an orator, of swelling period and appropriate ornament; a writer and critic, versed thoroughly in the important subject-matter of his discourse—that he was all these things, besides the rest, is likewise known. And when these things have been enumerated, there remains still to be remembered that he was kind and just in action, and that scarcely second to his desire for excellent accomplishment in the art he was so happy in practising, came his fervent wish for the general advance of the members of his profession, and his laborious, often unrewarded, effort for the growth of artistic appreciation among a public curiously insensitive—as much in painting as in literature—to the dictates of high taste and to the charm of technical achievement.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EXCAVATIONS IN CYPRUS.

Magdalen College, Oxford: Jan. 25, 1896.

The report which appeared in the ACADEMY of January 11 [As there stated, this report was quoted from the Times—Ed. ACADEMY] of the British Museum's excavations in Cyprus contains a series of remarkable statements, which seem partly to assume, partly to advocate, a chronology of Mykenesian civilisation which is open to serious question.

To describe a gem, engraved in the style of the Vaphio gold cups, as "possibly as late as 700 B.C." is simply to throw to the winds everything which is known about the succession of styles, either in Greece itself or in the Levant, on the evidence of the present form of one gem in soft stone, which is in any case unique, which seems to have been re-shaped, and which is characteristic, not of 700 B.C., but of a period so much later as to be admittedly out of the question. But for the fact that it was found inside a tomb which contained Mykenesian vases, one would say, without hesitation, that the gem had been picked up and trimmed down by a Hellenistic or Roman jeweller, so as to fit a ring of his own making.

There is no reason to doubt the late date (XXVIth Dynasty, or possibly later) of the sard-scarab with the name (or is it the effigy?) of Khonsu. Note in passing that "competent authorities" have hesitated as to the identification. But how does it come about that one gem of this class occurs in a Mykenesian tomb, whereas the numerous others which are reported from Cyprus are all from tombs of an entirely different character, mature "geometrical" tombs, which are on every ground clearly assignable to this same seventh century, but from which has disappeared every trace of the Mykenesian tradition which influences the earlier Geometrical style in Cyprus, and points to a long interval between the tombs with sard-scarabs and the tombs of Mykenesian age?

Further, in face of the consensus of evidence as to the succession of styles in Cyprus, it is inconceivable that no seventh-century Cypriote pottery or fibulae (which are quite clearly recognisable) should have been found in the Mykenesian tombs at Kurion (where there is a large and characteristic seventh-century necropolis on a distinct site), if the Mykenesian tombs are really of that date. And again, if Mykenesian pottery of Ialysian types was imported into Cyprus in the seventh century, why are there no Rhodian vases of the recognised seventh-century style along with them? Such vases occur, though rarely, in Cypriote tombs, but always with Cypriote Geometrical pottery, not with hand-made "pre-Phoenician" vessels as in this instance.

For the report states that associated with the Mykenesian vases was "a considerable quantity of rude and primitive pottery, such as is found in Cypriote tombs of the pre-Phoenician period." Now these "hand-made" vases absolutely disappear, on all other known sites in Cyprus, before the wheel-made Geometrical style with Mykenesian traditions, and therefore "post-Mykenesian," becomes established; and we have seen that even this takes place long before the introduction of sard-scarabs.

Further, if this rude pottery is "pre-Phoenician," as the report assumes, and if the large kraters with quasi-Mykenesian pictorial decoration are, as is therein stated, only found on "pre-Phoenician" sites, these Mykenesian tombs themselves must be "pre-Phoenician"; and in that case how can they be of the eighth, much more of the seventh, century? For Phoenician influence can be dated with certainty in Cyprus as early as 850 or 900 B.C. Therefore, either the style of the kraters—obviously transitional from Mykenesian to Geometrical, and therefore transitory—persisted through several centuries; or else the Phoenician dates are wrong, and there were no Phoenicians in Cyprus till after 650 B.C. Both conclusions are absurd.

The late date of the "Phoenician cylinder" mentioned in the report might be contested, but the cylinder falls into the same category as the sard-scarab. Without throwing doubt on the observations of those in charge of the excavations, so far as they go, we may fairly ask whether they, or, what is more important, whether the native workmen—who are experts in such matters—saw any sign that the sard-tomb or the cylinder-tomb had been re-entered in antiquity. Tomb robbery, to say nothing of subsequent burials in early tombs, can be traced in almost every period in Cyprus; with the result that individual finds have even less value there than they may sometimes be allowed elsewhere.

We must, of course, await the full particulars of the state of these tombs when opened, and of the disposition of their contents, which should be forthcoming before long. But we may fairly protest meanwhile against the assumption, in a semi-official memorandum, of the truth of a chronology which has never been seriously maintained, and is controverted by the great majority of the facts.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. LESLIE STEPHEN has been appointed a trustee of the National Portrait Gallery.

THE winter exhibition at the Grafton Galleries, consisting mainly of pictures of the Barbizon school, will open next week. Other exhibitions are: examples of Mr. Hubert Herkomer's "new black and white art," at the Fine Art Society's; water-colour drawings, at Messrs. Arthur Tooth & Sons'; the pictures and designs submitted for prizes offered by Messrs. C. W. Faulkner & Co., at the Royal Institute.

THE evening discourse at the Royal Institution next Friday will be delivered by the Hon. John Collier, on "Portrait Painting in its Historical Aspects."

IN connexion with the London Ethical Society, a lecture will be delivered to-morrow (Sunday) evening, at Essex Hall, Strand, by Mr. D. G. McColl on "Impressionism, or the Logic of Modern Painting."

IT has been resolved by the students of the Slade School of Art to issue a new quarterly, entitled the Quarto, the first number of which will appear shortly. Contributions have already been promised by the following artists and authors: The late Lord Leighton, Prof. Fred. Brown, Dr. John Todhunter, Mr. Joseph Pennell, Mr. George Frampton, Mr. Gleeson White, M. Alphonse Legros, Mr. J. Baptiste Calkin, Mr. P. Wilson Steer, Miss Netta Syrett, Mr. W. W. Russell, M. E. Grasset, Mr. John Payne, Mr. Percy Hemingway, Mr. William Strang, Mr. George Clausen, Mr. Joseph S.

Ward, Mr. John da Costa, Mr. Henry Tonks, Mr. G. F. Watts, Miss Evelyn Sharp, Mr. J. Pryde, Mr. E. F. Strange, Mr. G. P. Jacomb Hood, Mr. Will Rothenstein, Miss A. Woodward, Mr. Arthur Thomson, Mr. H. Campbell, Mr. Harrington Mann. A "Holy Family," by Andrea del Sarto (by the permission of Mr. Leopold de Rothschild), will be produced in photogravure as the frontispiece of the first number. There will also be issued a collectors' edition of twenty copies, bound in vellum, and printed on Japanese paper; with each copy will be given a small original autograph sketch by one of the contributors—no two will be alike; and also an original etching by Mr. William Strang. The work will be printed and published by Messrs. J. S. Virtue & Co.

THE following pictures, purchased for the National Gallery from the Scarpa collection, sold at Milan in November last, have now been placed in Room No. IX.: "The Saviour rising from the Tomb," by Gaudenzio Ferrari; and "The Walk to Emmaus," by Lelio Orsi, called Lelio of Novellara. Also a "Landscape, with View of Oxford," by R. Ladbroke, purchased out of the Lewis Fund, has been placed in Room XX.

THE late Carlo Giuliano, of Piccadilly, has bequeathed to the South Kensington Museum a very valuable collection of jewellery, consisting for the most part of gold ornaments, decorated with minute granulations after the Greek and Etruscan fashion. One of the necklaces has fifty-two amphora-shaped pendants, and is most delicately enriched with no less than 167,580 tiny gold granules. There are also some examples of enamelled jewellery—notably two flower necklaces, further ornamented with pearls and brilliants. Messrs. C. and A. Giuliano, the sons of the late Carlo Giuliano, have generously added to their father's bequest not only a beautiful crystal case, but also a small reproduction in gilded bronze of the statuette of Victory found at Pompeii, and now in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. These admirable specimens of the goldsmith's and jeweller's art are provisionally exhibited in a separate case in the South Court of the South Kensington Museum.

OBITUARY.

SIR JOSEPH BARNBY.

WITHIN a short space of time two prominent musicians have been suddenly called away from spheres of activity. When the summons to depart came, Sir C. Hallé had attained to a ripe old age; Sir J. Barnby, on the other hand, was still in the prime of life. It sometimes happens that distinguished men are dead to the world long ere they quit it—that after years of storm and stress they should enjoy a short period of calm repose seems reasonable enough; yet for those who are earnest workers a sudden death, however tragic it may appear, is surely the best.

Sir J. Barnby will long be remembered for his useful work at Eton College, and for the energy and ability with which he formed and maintained a choir, the fame of which became world-wide. Choral works of any importance by English composers were always granted a hearing at the Albert Hall Concerts. Though somewhat conservative in his tastes, Sir Joseph was an admirer of Wagner, and the two concert performances which he gave of the "Parsifal" music in 1884 deserve special record. His tenure of office as Principal of the Guildhall School of Music was only a brief one. He seemed, however, the right man in the right place: he was firm, yet courteous. As a musician, he was modest; as a man, true-hearted.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Helpful Papers for Harmony Students. By H. C. Banister. (William Rider & Son.)

THE writer of this little book has had many years' experience in teaching harmony. He therefore knows points likely to perplex students, and errors into which they are prone to fall; and he is able to offer many a wise hint and caution. The book has, however, a wider significance. Mr. Banister does not intend it to be a text-book of harmony; but by touching on various matters concerning which there is diversity of opinion among theorists, he expounds, and occasionally criticises, the various views, and thus widens the knowledge of students, and helps to render that knowledge more intelligent. There are various theories of harmony, and to a beginner such a comparative study would prove perplexing; if, however, he has carefully followed the teachings of any one school, the reading of Mr. Banister will prove both a pleasure and a profit. The results of conflicting systems has had its bad effect on examination papers; and our author gives instances in which questions set are capable of different answers, and are even calculated to mislead a candidate. In one place he refers to "cramming, the craze of the present day." Cramming may in certain cases be necessary, but it is a poor way of learning; knowledge quickly acquired is quickly lost. The volume under notice does not in any way pander to that craze. In the fourth chapter Mr. Banister recommends students to "be submissive to rules given to guide and curb them." Further on he tells us also that books and rules "have no authority over matured musicians." Intelligent students, however—and these only concern us for the moment—should not be too "submissive," but try and understand the reason of rules. Again, as it seems to us, rules, if sound, should have authority even over matured musicians: the rules that musicians of genius have set at naught have, in most cases, been those to which pedantic teachers and servile scholars had given unsubstantial authority.

Dictionary of British Musicians. By Frederick J. Crowest (Jarrold.) Many readers pass over the preface of a book; and we recommend those who do not wish to entertain too harsh an opinion of the volume under notice to do likewise. For purposes of criticism, however, a preface must be taken into consideration. The compiler prides himself on having produced "a distinctly accurate book," and one "up-to-date." It is, however, scarcely accurate to mention Mr. H. F. Frost as "organist of the Chapel Royal, Savoy," from which post he withdrew several years ago; while Dr. Stainer is correctly described as "late organist of St. Paul's Cathedral." Again, Prof. Prout is mentioned as "musical critic of the Athenaeum." This elliptical form of expression might perhaps be pardoned in a dictionary so compressed; but when we find C. L. Gruneison described in a similar manner, and no mention of his death, the result is confusing. Of J. Joule, although his death is mentioned, we are further informed that he "was" critic of the Manchester Courier. There is a lack of completeness about some of the information. Three of Arabella Goddard's teachers are given, but not the principal one—Mr. J. W. Davison; the death of Sir W. Cusins is not entered; and Mr. Fuller Maitland is vaguely described as "Author of Schumann," &c. We miss, among others, the names of Mr. A. Hervey, the well-known composer and critic, and of Mr. L. Borwick, our rising pianist. Once more, why have some names been treated with undue brevity, others with undue fulness? Dr. C. H. Parry is merely an "English composer," Dr. C. A. Macfarren a "composer of many works of the first order," Dr. A. C. Mackenzie a "Scottish composer," but Mr. Hamish MacCunn a "Scottish composer of great talent."

MUSIC NOTES.

THE programme of Mr. Henschel's fifth concert last week included two works by Beethoven, belonging to his so-called second period. The first was the Concerto for pianoforte, violin, and pianoforte with orchestra (Op. 58); the second, the C minor Symphony. The latter is regarded by all musicians as one of the most powerful manifestations of the composer's genius; by some, as the most powerful. The Concerto, on the other hand, although it bears distinct traces of the master's hand, not to speak of themes reminiscent of important compositions which occupied his attention at the time in which it was written, is on a far lower level; the workmanship is excellent, but the music lacks, for the most part, inspiration. The very idea of a Concerto with three solo instruments does not seem a happy one; it creates division rather than concentration of interest. The work was probably a pièce d'occasion, and it is now seldom given. The performers, Messrs. Borwick, Arboe, and Paul Ludwig deserve commendation. Mme. Marie Duma sang the Scene and Aria from "Fidelio" with earnestness and intelligence. The Symphony, under Mr. Henschel's direction, was well performed; yet the conductor did not reveal the full power of the music; the slow movement received the best interpretation.

MR. MARK HAMBURG, who appeared four or five seasons ago as Max Hambourg, gave a pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. He is still young, and bids fair to take rank among the greatest pianists. He has a sympathetic touch and remarkable execution. Of the latter he gave proof in the Bach-Tausig Toccata and Fugue in D minor, and of both in some difficult variations by J. Raff, also in show pieces by Lechetzky, and a Liszt Rhapsodie. Of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 31, No. 3) an intelligent reading was given; yet, on the whole, the Allegro lacked breadth, the Scherzo lightness, and the Menuetto grace. The "Faschingschwank" of Schumann also presented points for criticism. The shortcomings in the interpretation of these two works must not, however, be too strongly emphasised; at a first appearance a pianist, for evident reasons, is seldom at his best. Mr. Mark Hambourg has announced a second recital, at which he will perform works that will fully test all his powers; among these are Bach's Fantaisie Chromatique et Fugue, Schumann's great Fantasia in C (Op. 17), and some Chopin Etudes.

THREE concerts are announced at the Queen's Hall, on April 28, May 14, and June 11, under the conductorship of Mr. Felix Mottl. Mr. Eugen d'Albert will appear at the first, and perform Beethoven's Concerto in E flat (Op. 73). A curiosity in the programme is Beethoven's "Wellington's Sieg," or "The Battle of Vittoria" (Op. 91). The second and third concerts will be devoted to Wagner, the programmes containing important excerpts from the four sections of the "Ring des Nibelungen."

an attempt—hitherto, alas! futile—to save England from humiliation and dishonour. But we do most sincerely trust that every one will buy the book and read the burning words, both poetry and prose, with which Mr. Watson has striven

"All who feel strongly over the terrible state of affairs in South-Eastern Europe, and all lovers of poetry, should secure Mr. Watson's purple-covered booklet, which enshrines some of the most virile verse of the time."—Sunday Times.

"His Armenian sonnets will take rank with the best of his work, and we have long since said that this is among the best that any living English writer has to give. He is unequalled for loftiness, for sustained strength of passion, for feeling, and for his exquisite sense of language as a technical instrument."—Daily News.

"His great things are indubitably great, and in the 'Hymn to the Sea' he has written an ode which has all the wealth and movement of a chorus of Euripides, or, better still, of Aristophanes, a poem which men will quote hereafter as rising from that prosaic level of what Mr. Watson calls an 'iterative world' into a purer and diviner air."

"He goes upon the old lines, he is 'of the centre,' as Matthew Arnold would have said. He feels and carries out the great common traditions of English verse: he would think it no shame to say he had been formed upon Shakespeare and Wordsworth and Keats."—The Times.

PHILOSOPHY OF THEISM.(The Edwin. Gifford Lectures, 1894-95. 1st Series.)*By ALEXANDER CAMPBELL FRASER, LL.D., Hon. D.C.L., Oxford; Emeritus Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh.

Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"The whole subject is treated with a breadth and largeness of view, an intellectual grasp, and a lucidity of thought and language that must commend the work to every intelligent reader."—Spectator."A very striking exposition of the speculative bases of 'natural theology.'... Trained speculative thinkers... will not fail to do justice to his dialectical acumen and his rare skill in philosophical exposition."—Times."This volume should gain a wide circulation, for, although severely philosophical in its thinking, it is in expression absolutely lucid.... The lectures are throughout interesting and to the point, and present a sincere, thorough, and profitable discussion of a great theme."—British Weekly."Bear the marks of practised thought on metaphysical subjects, and of ripened wisdom. The chapters that deal with Pantheism are models of what controversy on theological matters ought to be—logical, sympathetic, courteous."—Liverpool Mercury."These lectures form most instructive and stimulating reading. In them we have the Professor at his best. Subtle thought, a fine reflectiveness, analysis of the most penetrating sort, with a wide knowledge of the history of human thought, are here."—Aberdeen Free Press.

LITERATURE.

The Growth of British Policy. By the late Sir J. R. Seeley, K.C.M.G., &c. In 2 vols. (Cambridge: At the University Press.)

WHEN Sir John Seeley's lamented death took place last January, it was known that an important work from his pen, dealing with some of the larger aspects of modern English history, was more or less ready for publication. Expectation is now fulfilled by these volumes, which are produced under the reverent and competent editorship of Prof. Prothero. The disciples of a teacher of the utmost truthfulness, and the admirers of a writer of the rarest fascination, when they reflect that these are his last words to them, have abundant matter for fresh gratitude and fresh regret.

British Policy, as Seeley conceived it, has a peculiar meaning. It is not, as one might suppose, the totality of British statesmanship, but the sum of England's foreign or international policy since England and Scotland began to draw together; and this book is an essay on British foreign relations between 1558 and 1702. The key to it is to be found in an article contributed by Seeley to the Contemporary Review for July, 1894, to which Prof. Prothero refers in his brief memoir, and which might with much advantage have been incorporated as an introduction to the book. In that article two faults were found with the prevailing treatment of English history. It was maintained that it was both too insular and too comprehensive, and that an inadequate treatment of foreign policy was the result.

"It is not sufficient to trace the course of internal development in our own country; we should trace at the same time the development of those other States which in various ways . . . have modified and received modification from our internal development. . . . In general, we undertake to treat everything at once—internal affairs, legislation, foreign policy."

And so the last-named is apt to be buried under irrelevant matter. The cure for these evils is to isolate foreign policy, and to treat it as constitutional and economic phenomena have in recent times been treated, and as certain international phenomena have been treated by M. Sorel in France, and by Droysen in Germany. The volumes before us represent Seeley's effort to apply the remedy he had suggested. They are thus eminently characteristic of their author, who distinguished himself as a theorist on historical writing and teaching, who strove to reduce theory to practice, and follow precept by example.

There can be no doubt that in the work before us a success has been achieved which may, without extravagance, be called brilliant. As Prof. Prothero reminds us, the task of treating European international history since the Reformation in the manner, and within the limits, of an intelligible and interesting essay is a gigantic one; and yet here undeniably the task has been accomplished. Nothing essential has been omitted, and yet there is neither confusion nor lassitude; no member is wanting to the august procession; no point is slurred in the entrancing drama. Such a triumph over such difficulty makes The Growth of British Policy Seeley's best historical work. In it alone, or in it with The Expansion of England as a pendant, does he realise his idea of history as concerned exclusively with the State. In The Life of Stein he was entangled in biography; in The Short History of Napoleon he was forced to swerve into narrative, in which he disbelieved, and in which he could not succeed. But here the State is everything; and here at last the reader is made to feel that for his edification, and even for his entertainment, the State is enough.

As a matter of course, the book starts from Charles V., and more particularly from his abdication in 1555, three years before the accession of Elizabeth. Charles, representing on the one hand the union between Austria and Burgundy, and on the other the union between the Empire and Spain, is the fountain-head of modern international history; and his abdication, which gave rise to the two branches of the House of Habsburg, is, for the policy of more than a century, the decisive moment of his career.

The marriage of Charles's grandfather Maximilian with Mary of Burgundy furnishes Seeley with his keynote:

"We shall have occasion over and over again to mark the vast consequences which flowed in many States, and often were intended to flow, from Royal marriages, so we shall cease to think of the system as Austrian, and shall regard it as almost the established system of foreign politics in the greater part of Europe."

After the marriage of Maximilian and Mary came that of Philip and Juana; and the vast dominions of their child were permanently ruled by family or dynastic influence.

While, by the union of Mary Tudor with Philip II. of Spain, England was for a moment threatened with final entanglement in the dynastic web, we are led to mark how the resolute maidenhood of Elizabeth preserved through many difficulties the insularity of the island-state, laid the foundations of union between England and Scotland, and so made possible what Seeley calls a national policy—that is to say, a policy animated by "a strong sense of national interest and a strong glow of national patriotism," almost amounting to the modern idea of nationality. The antithesis between those two systems, the dynastic and the national, is the main-spring of the book. The growth of our policy, according to Seeley, "consisted in throwing off the dynastic system and adopting instead a national system." The national system was not adopted for good until the eighteenth century, when the Stewarts were got rid of and the dominant influences of British policy were commercial expansion and contention with France for the possession of the New World. Between the anticipation under Elizabeth and the completion under William III. came an interval of fluctuation which is invested by Seeley with dramatic interest. He makes us see the dynastic system restored slowly but steadily under the first two Stewart kings of England; while we are led to trace all the troubles which produced the Revolution of 1688 to an ultimate source in the marriage of Charles I. with Henrietta Maria, by which a French and Catholic bias was given to the English royal house. On the other hand, Cromwell's striking foreign policy is regarded by Seeley as a return to the national system of Elizabeth, "a kind of anticipation, though premature and precarious, of the national British policy of the eighteenth century." It was made so partly by the absence of kingship, with its dynastic entanglements and temptations; partly by the militarism of the Commonwealth, by which the State was enabled to give splendid effect to a policy of adventure, and to combine with other States for principle instead of family aggrandisement.

In the foreign policy of Charles II.'s reign Seeley finds a struggle between the national and dynastic systems. Charles was restored in leading-strings, and his early policy was essentially that of Clarendon. This policy, at least in comparison with that which followed it, may be called national—it involved no violent breach with Cromwellian tradition. When, however, Charles was set free by the disappearance of Clarendon and the other leading statesmen of the Restoration, he yielded to the bent common to all Henrietta Maria's children, and, by the Treaty of Dover, inaugurated a Bourbon and Catholicising policy which, pursued with less craft, but without more real violence, by James II., led to the Revolution.

But while there is an ignoble and "unnational" dynastic policy, there is a dynastic policy which is a blessing and ministers to the best national interests. Such a policy was the marriage of James IV. of Scotland with Margaret Tudor; and such, above all, was the marriage of William III. with Mary of England in 1675. Nothing in the book is fresher or more valuable than the treatment of Anglo-Dutch relations between 1641 and 1688. We are so apt to think of the United Provinces as a republic that we miss the full significance of the Stadholderate. The monarchical aspect of Dutch politics is by Seeley brought into just prominence, and thus we realise the double mission of the hero of 1688. He was no mere pilot-adventurer summoned in extremity to steer the ship of the State through unexpected breakers, but in blood and bone, by birth and by marriage, a Stewart of the Stewarts, the heir of a monarchical tradition alike in England and in Holland, and yet the instrument of Britain's final deliverance from family politics, her consolidator on a basis of unhindered national strength.

With the completion of the Revolution—not, indeed, in the event of 1688, but in the Act of Settlement and the union with Scotland—Seeley's task comes to an end. With Anne on the throne, and the Hanoverian succession secured, British Policy attained maturity and became "fixed." Britain was now a united commercial State, one of the great sea powers of the world; now begins the epoch of her expansion in rivalry with the other great sea power, France.

It would be difficult to overstate the merit of this book, whether considered as characteristic of its author, as a piece of literature, or as an educational text-book. There is, indeed, a unity in all Seeley's work, in which The Growth of British Policy fully shares. He was not, as he might at first sight appear, a desultory writer on disconnected subjects, such as religion, history, and literature, but a thinker for whom there was essentially but one interest—namely, society, studied either specifically in the state, or more widely in humanity, as the subject of vast religious and intellectual influences. Looked at in this light, The Growth of British Policy falls into line even with Eccles Homo and Natural Religion, and it is worthy of its comrades. Seeley's peculiar genius, that of an original, impartial, and open-minded observer of large social and intellectual changes, determines all his work and explains the naïveté, freshness, and purity of his consistent and fascinating style. The secret of his distinction is in his originality: the originality as of one who, in spite of the fullest maturity of cultured thought, looks on men and things with the unspoiled apprehension of a child.

Regarded as literature, the work reaches and maintains the high standard of its author. The charge of dulness, so often brought against historians who distrust the picturesque style, is assuredly not relevant to this book, where States are shown to move and counter-move with the grace, precision, and inevitableness of figures in some stately dance. So well managed is the evolution of the story that the introduction of each new element into the complex whole comes without bewilderment, and one reads on with unflagging interest to the end. Nor is the book without vivid personal touches. Elizabeth lives again, standing out "among an armed nation like Britannia herself"—Oliver with his "Pan-evangelical idea," Charles II. with his "indolent adroitness," are much more than names or shadows. Above all does William III., the reconciler of so many antagonisms, the champion of so many interests, receive fresh and fitting tribute.

As an educational manual the essay will be of the highest value. Students of history at the Universities have many excellent aids to familiarity with constitutional and economic phenomena; but they have hitherto had to range over wide and separate fields for results such as are here brought together with so much coherence and force. Now, at last, they may easily know all that was at stake while Mary Stewart reigned in Scotland or while the fate of Philip II.'s suit to Elizabeth hung in the balance; here for the first time the historic importance of royal marriages is made current coin; henceforward, let us hope, "War of Devolution" and "Spanish Succession" will cease to be mere flying signals of ennui and despair. Though minute criticism of work so excellent as this would be out of place, it is impossible to avoid reflecting both on the strength and weakness of Seeley as a teacher of history. In the inevitable division of labour between research and reflection Seeley took his place in the latter category. He accepted the material which the searchers and sifters gave him, and drew from it large generalisations and telling morals. The sympathy of our learned centres is with research, because it is as a rule more solid and genuine than what gives itself out as the philosophy of history; but there are so many instances of the sterility of mere hypotheses founded on extreme minuteness of evidence that we must turn with gratitude to thinkers who are able to refer well-ascertained facts to a living intellectual order.

That Seeley's method is not without dangers is evident enough even from the book under consideration. In all brilliant and original comment on well-known facts there is some risk of the far-fetched and the fantastic: of artificial antitheses, illusory comparisons, and unsuccessful affiliations. Is not, for example, Seeley's effort to make Cromwell's influence so largely responsible for the policy of the two last Stewart kings a little forced and fanciful? Is not the revolutionary character of the period 1673 to 1688 a little overstated in the attempt to avoid understating it? Is not perfect sobriety somewhat sacrificed to effect when James II. is spoken of as "a sort of Gallican," or when William III. and Marlborough are called the "two Cromwells" of the "Second Revolution"? One might also perhaps take exception to the almost Carlylese reiteration of vague or question-begging words, such as the "Imperialism" of Oliver Cromwell, or the "Machiavelism" of Charles II. What comes to the teacher as a luminous suggestion is not always safe as a naked light in the disciple's hand.

As might be expected, the care of author and editor has kept the accuracy of the work up to a very high standard. One or two sentences suggest, if they do not necessarily imply, error. Thus the expression on vol. i., p. 12—"Two Habsburg emperors, Rudolf and Albert, reigned in succession"—obscures the fact that between the death of Rudolf and the election of Albert there intervened the six years' reign of a prince of another house—Adolf of Nassau. Again, on vol. i., p. 32, Seeley writes as if he reckoned the Magyar Hungary as a Slavonic kingdom. Once more, what are we to make of this (vol. ii., p. 86)?

"What we loosely call the Protectorate is in fact four or five different governments—the government of a lord-general with an assembly of Puritan notables, the Protectorate under the instrument of government, imperialism by means of the major-generals," and so on.

Surely, to speak of the Commonwealth as a Protectorate before there was a Protector is very loose indeed.

When we arrive, all too soon, at the end of this book we think with deep regret how we should have prized such invaluable guidance through the mazes of international detail in the eighteenth century. Still, there is The Expansion of England; and for that, so far as it serves us, we must be thankful. Sir John Seeley modestly speaks of his work as an introduction, but we must not be misled by that. We have in The Growth of British Policy something much better than a sketch or a fragment: we have at once a touching memorial and a monument that will endure.

DAVID WATSON RANNIE.

Miscellaneous Studies. By Walter Pater. (Macmillans.)

THIS is the eighth of the familiar dark green volumes, bearing the name of Walter Pater, which fill a considerable space on the shelf, where, only ten years ago, The Renaissance stood alone. Since then, as the fruits of his genius ripened slowly, he gave them deliberately to us; but of late more rapidly, since the completion of Marius the Epicurean, his longest work, left him free to finish in his scrupulous manner the short essays and "imaginary portraits," which used to appear in the monthly reviews and reappear, more scrupulously finished still, in volumes. Some of these scattered writings, reverently gathered by Mr. Shadwell, form the present book, nearly, if not quite, the last which we may look for. In the useful chronological list of Pater's published writings, appended to Mr. Shadwell's preface, we notice only two—the fragmentary "Gaston de Latour" and an essay on Giordano Bruno—which have not been reprinted. The list contains no reference to the essay by Pater prefixed to Mr. Shadwell's own translation of the Purgatorio, published in 1892. The omission is doubtless intentional, and it is not for us to question its propriety; though we should have been glad to see the essay itself, slight as it is, included among its author's Miscellanies. One inaccuracy in the aforesaid list forces itself upon our notice, for it refers to the essay on Pascal, actually the last to appear of Pater's writings. The date of its publication in the Contemporary Review is here given as December, 1894; though the correct date, February, 1895, appears at the head of the essay itself. So provoking a misprint as that of "land" for "hand," on p. 34, in the lecture on Raphael, should not have been transferred without correction from the pages of the Fortnightly Review. "Metre les points sur les i" is a maxim which the editor of scholarly works need not despise.

The contents of the volume are indeed miscellaneous, and should appeal to readers of very varied taste, though they are as little likely as any of the author's writings to be popular. There are two essays on literature, two on Italian painting, two on French architecture; then comes a group of three "imaginary portraits," to adopt Pater's own term for his studies of a period or a type of character under the guise of fiction. In "Emerald Uthwart" he is more nearly a novelist than elsewhere, but lacks rapidity of movement: the thing is not so much a narrative as a meditation. Lastly, in "Diaphaneité," a previously unpublished essay of very early date, we find analysis of character pure and simple, a severely abstract disquisition on one of "those evanescent shades, which fill up the blanks between contrasted types of character." So evanescent is it, that it refuses to take a tangible or visible form, or restrict itself by the conditions of personality :

"Ter frustra compressa manus effugit imago."

The style is curiously unlike that of later years, with its slow development of a thought by a series of plastic touches which appeal to the imagination, adding colour and shape even to the object of a purely intellectual process. Here there is no lack of light, but the flashes are misdirected and bewildering, so that they neutralise one another, and obscurity results. Aphorisms and paradoxes follow one another in brief, incisive phrases, which, as he says elsewhere of Mérimée's creations, have no atmosphere, and need expansion to gain that "expressiveness" which is "the essence of all good style, whatever its accidents may be."

To this expressiveness, which he admires in Pascal, Pater himself, even—nay especially—in his later work, does not always attain. Felicitous as he is in the single phrase, he has not mastered the structure of the period, and falls too easily into the snare of the parenthesis. Here is an example of loose structure :

"They seem scarcely meant for him—words like those! increase however his sense of responsibility to the place, of which he is now more exclusively than before a part—that he belongs to it, its great memories, great dim purposes; deepen the consciousness he had on first coming hither of a demand in the world about him, whereof the very stones are emphatic, to which no average human creature could be sufficient; of reproof, reproaches, of this or that in himself."

Another besetting sin is the inability to choose between two alternative expressions almost, though not quite, identical in meaning, with the result that he places both, side by side, in a sentence where only one could rightly be admitted. Nay, he will even add a third, now and then. It is not fair to quote critically from the essay on Pascal without remembering that it was left unfinished at Pater's death; but such a sentence as the following betrays this hesitating manner of composition, of which the traces were not always removed in the last revision :

"In that somewhat gloomy, that too deeply impressed, that fanatical age, they were the Calvinists of the Roman Catholic Church, maintaining, emphasising in it, a view, a tradition really constant in it from St. Augustin, from St. Paul himself."

We are not blind to the faults of Pater's style, but it is more pleasant to dwell on its merits; and there are many pages in the present book which are full of his peculiar, inimitable charm. There are exquisite descriptions of pictures, the Ansidei Madonna, Moretto's St. Ursula, Borgognone's deacons in the Certosa. Many travellers in Lombardy are probably unaware that it contains anything worth seeing except Milan Cathedral and the lamentable ruin of "The Last Supper." Only those whose curiosity has led them into less familiar sanctuaries, at Varallo, Novara, Pavia, Bergamo, and Brescia, can appreciate Pater's sympathetic studies of the local art of those towns, all within sight of the Alps. The special fascination of it lies in the perfect harmony between the painting and the surroundings amid which it grew into being, amid which it still remains: surroundings in the narrower sense, chapel or sacristy, with their tarsia-work and precious inlaid marbles, their dainty terra-cotta mouldings by Raimondi, or the frame, perhaps, of a door or window by Amadeo of Pavia, all set within some stately fabric of Bramante's or Borgognone's own design; surroundings, again, in the wider sense—the town, with its palaces and fountains, the hill on which it stands, or the plain around it, and ever beyond these the white peaks in the North. This special fascination appealed most strongly to so sensitive an observer as Pater. In a few pages of discursive notes he has expressed exactly the distinctive charm of every one of these towns and of the artist who is most peculiarly at home in it, who can indeed hardly be studied elsewhere. Ferrari, Borgognone, Romanino, and Moretto are the artists of whom he has most to say. Yet he seems hardly to have noticed sufficiently the work in fresco of the two first-mentioned painters. The sound of "much exquisite church-music, violins or the like," the music still to be heard at Novara—that is just what one associates with Gaudenzio Ferrari: but it is above all that wonderful dome full of angels at Saronno that makes his name melodious. And, granting the majestic strength of the bishops and deacons in Borgognone's altarpieces at the Certosa, yet we find him stronger and more majestic still in the vast, solemn frescoes of the transepts, or of the apse of S. Simpliciano at Milan.

On Raphael less remains to be said, unless you take up the cudgels for Bode or Morelli and discuss the Venetian Sketch-book; and if Pater has said the obvious things about him with a diction more ornate than is commonly found in a University Extension lecture, he has not altogether avoided blunders, and has not impressed his own personality strongly on the subject. Only the above-mentioned page on the Ansidei Madonna is memorable for a few beautiful sentences :

"In this cool, pearl-grey, quiet place, where colour tells for double, the jewelled cope, the painted book in the hand of Mary, the chaplet of red coral—one is reminded that among all classical writers Raphael's preference was for the faultless Virgil. . . . He seems still to be saying, before all things, from first to last, 'I am utterly purposed that I will not offend.'"

That is a favourite thought of Pater's, to be traced in all his books: the value of colour enhanced through economy, "counting for double" against a background of "Lenten or monastic colours, brown and black, white and grey." He knows the effect of such economy, such sudden contrasted brilliance, in his own art of writing prose. No one who heard him read his lecture on Mérimée at Oxford can have forgotten the startling words, with which he closed a paragraph of criticism on Mérimée's historical essays :

"As if he but held up to view, as a piece of evidence, some harshly dyed oriental carpet from the sumptuous floor of the Kremlin, on which blood had fallen."

In the essays on two great French churches, Amiens and Vézelay, he emphasises most successfully the correspondence of either building to one of two contrasted types: "As Notre-Dame d'Amiens is pre-eminently the church of the city, of a commune, so the Madeleine of Vézelay is typically the church of a monastery." The two essays are inspired by the thought of this contrast between the secular and the regular clergy, the lay and the monastic craftsmen, the Gothic and the Romanesque style, the lightness of Amiens, the solidity and gloom of Vézelay. Everybody knows Amiens; but without endorsing Shelley's opinion that "There is nothing to see in France," there must be many, like the present writer, who had never heard of Vézelay till Pater wrote about it. It lies in a secluded part of Burgundy, far from any main line of railway, or from any considerable town, but in a beautiful district where the vines and the red-brown soil, glowing in mid-summer sunshine, seem to belong not to Central but to Southern France. Pater seems to have visited the place in gloomy weather, and this may have caused him to exaggerate the sombreness of "the grandest Romanesque interior in France, perhaps in the world." He may have travelled on some dark day from Vézelay to Auxerre, for there, too, in Denys l'Auxerrois, he set his architecture against a sky darkened with rain and storm-cloud.

His Denys was an avatar of Dionysus in the monastic middle age. It is the same strange fancy of a pagan god reappearing among bewildered, superstitious monks, a freakish visitor, causing disaster in the end, which has inspired "Apollo in Picardy" in the present volume. The catastrophe in the present story is the slaying of a second Hyacinthus by a mischance in quoit-playing, whereon the blue-bells burst into bloom, and poor, half-witted Prior Saint-Jean is suspected of the murder of the novice. Pater seems to have a grudge against Apollo, "that theatrical old Greek god," as he calls him in "Emerald Uthwart." In Picardy he is wantonly cruel, this Brother Apollyon, Apollo the destroyer, who kills for pastime in the night the gentle inmates of the monastic pigeon-house. But he is Apollo the healer too, who can calm by his harp-playing fits of madness in the Prior, and charm the very stones under the builders' hands into a graceful order. It is a fantastic but beautiful story, told in Pater's lightest manner, with many touches of humour, and innumerable felicities of diction.

The other two "imaginary portraits" are somewhat morbid and gloomy, dwelling too much on the details of disease and death, which cast a shadow in each over a young life. But we could not well spare the pages in "Emerald Uthwart," which describe the life at the King's School at Canterbury, under the shadow of the great cathedral, and the awakening of the literary instinct in the backward English lad, under the influence of the genius loci, the influence of the old walls themselves. Delightful, too, is the description of the "house" in which the "child" of the other story, Florian Deleal, was born and bred, with the traces of French taste about it: hereditary taste in a family which claimed descent from Watteau, as Walter Pater liked to think that he himself was akin to his namesake, Watteau's pupil, Jean Baptiste Pater.

And now, if we are saying farewell to him, remembering how much in Italy, France, and Greece he has quickened with the breath of his imagination, may we borrow the words of Vernon Lee, and express our gratitude to Walter Pater for "that which, in expounding the beautiful things of the past, he has added to the beautiful things of the present"?

CAMPBELL DODGSON.

A Second Series of Fleet Street Eclogues. By John Davidson. (John Lane.)

"WHY will you hug the coasts of hell?" cries one of Mr. Davidson's patriotic journalists to Menzies, who is protesting that "there is no England now," and whose sombre outlook can take in neither the glory of the spring nor of his country's present:

"I cannot see the stars and flowers,
Nor hear the lark's soprano ring,
Because a ruddy darkness lowers
For ever, and the tempests sing.
I see the strong coerce the weak,
And labour, overwrought, rebel;
I hear the useless treadmill creak,
The prisoner cursing in his cell;
I see the loafer-burnished wall;
I hear the rotting match-girl whine;
I see the unalept switchman fall;
I hear the explosion in the mine;
I see along the heedless street
The sandwichman trudge through the mire;
I hear the tired quick tripping feet
Of sad, gay girls who ply for hire."

An undeniably powerful indictment. There are two such pessimists, preachers, unflinching observers—call them what you will—in Mr. Davidson's chorus; and it is to be remarked that their creator, perhaps unconsciously, gives them the best of the argument. Here and there the debate ("debate—the sergeant-major of the tongue"—

"... Debate
That overmasters armies; that distills
From rancorous commotion amity")— flows; each puppet (for all are puppets save Ninian) takes up his parable, but always Menzies and Ninian, advocati diaboli, conquer in the end. Menzies, indeed, is a waverer. In "St. George's Day," the Eclogue from which the passage above is quoted, he considers on what foundations the "weal and strength" of England stand. "This is St. George's Day," cries Basil. "St. George? A wretched thief, I vow," answers Menzies; and then Herbert and Percy, twin Jingoos, fall to and sing their country's praise in lines which show how Mr. Davidson, spite his vigour and resource, his exquisite fancy and unfaltering power, can lose his sense of criticism and descend to a whole passage made weakly by rhymes leading, not following, the sense:

"HERBERT: St. George for Merry England then!
For we are all good Englishmen!"

"PERCY: We stand as our forefathers stood For Liberty's and Conscience's sake.

"HERBERT: We are the sons of Robin Hood,
The sons of Hereward the Wake.

"PERCY: The sons of yeomen, English-fed,
Ready to feast or drink or fight.

"HERBERT: The sons of kings—of Hal and Ned,
Who kept their island right and tight.

"PERCY: The sons of Cromwell's Ironsides,
Who knew no king but God above.

"BASIL: We are the sons of English brides, Who married Englishmen for love."

These precious, rhyming optimists, by a process of reasoning none too clear, arrive at the declarations of "St. George for Greater England, then!

The Boreal and the Austral men!"

that "Yankee blood is English blood"; and that "we are the world's forlorn hope"—and it is this last picturesque sentiment which wins over the recalcitrant Menzies to a proper state of patriotism.

This Imperial Eclogue contains one really fine passage:

"The Sphinx that watches by the Nile
Has seen great empires pass away:
The mightiest lasted but a while;
Yet ours shall not decay.
Because, although red blood may flow,
And ocean shake with shot,
Not England's sword but England's Word,
Undoes the Gordian Knot.
Bold tongue, stout heart, strong hand, brave brow
The world's four quarters win;
And patiently with axe and plough
We bring the deserts in."

The "but a while" of the third line is an instance of a curious infelicity which sometimes marks Mr. Davidson's work at its best. Thus, in a passage of exquisite description, a line occurs—"The ewes sedately browse the three-piled nap"—disastrous to the appreciation of a sensitive ear.

In "St. George's Day" it is Menzies, the Radical, who interests; and in "Lammas," the longest and the most seriously intentioned of the five Eclogues, it is Ninian, weary, insane almost, with his sad visions, who most attracts and convinces. I would there was space for adequate quotation from his descriptions of Edinburgh from Arthur's Seat, of the "Medway's bank," or of the sea when "the passionate sun flames through the shrivelled cloud"; or, again, of the sad burden of heredity under which he labours, the malady fin de siècle but serious—"the worm obscene in whose close coils I writhe." Here Mr. Davidson allows no reservation of his strength: the character is made clear with master strokes, his mind diseased and vision-haunted, a warning and a horror. I quote the passage with which the poem closes, the passage in which its characteristics meet, and the lines with which Ninian flings out from his friends into the darkness of fate.

"Yes... See,
They throng the room!—no spectres, but themselves:
Sibilant depths of darkness; avenues
Of latticed light; ambrosial, pine-strewn glades;
Ravines and waterfalls; the green-grass turf,
Where primroses by secret alchemy

Distill from buried treasure golden leaves,
And where forget-me-nots above the tombs
Of snow-drops hang their candelabra, trimmed
With azure light—turquoise by magic roots
Drawn from the bowels of the earth and changed
To living flame; roses, laburnum, lilac;
Sunrise and sunset like a glowing vice Bloodstained that grips the world; the restless moon
Swung low to light us; clouds; the limpid sky;
The bourdon of the great ground-bee, athwart
A lonely hill-side, vibrant on the air,
And subtler than the scent of violets;
Sonorous winds, storm, thunder, and the sea."

Were this poem alone, the impression it leaves would stamp Mr. Davidson as a poet of first-rate power. His sad conceptions have never received juster treatment. Ninian's son haunts one as does Little Father Time of Mr. Hardy's last novel.

But what has the volume, the reader who remembers "Ballads and Songs" and the first series of Eclogues may ask, of those qualities that are specially associated with Mr. Davidson's name—the qualities of observation, of picturesque description? Of such there is no lack. The mere phrase, "the loafer-burnished wall," in the first passage I have quoted, displays the old minute power of vision; and I could transcribe stanza after stanza steeped in the love of nature at her simplest, verses of the softest, most unconscious beauty. Here, for instance, from "All Hallow's Eve," one quatrain on the close of autumn in London:

"The dripping ivy drapes the walls;
The drenched red creepers flare;
And the dragged chestnut plumage falls
In every park and square."

The alliteration is magnificent, and yet the three adjectives seem inevitable, and the picture the quatrain conjures up is absolutely just and true. And so again and again: passage after passage wins the reader, convinces him that in Mr. Davidson we have a poet who, were all his other qualities of virility—almost wanton power—denied, would still live by his exquisite appreciation of the woods and lanes, of the secrets of the forest. But we know how much else his genius holds, how strong a criticism of life, how much narrative power, and how much keen insight into character. And the criticism of life is always relevant, never unnecessarily obtruded. That it is not optimistic he would possibly deny. But one cannot but take the impression given by this and his previous books. Here is his outlook, it seems to me, summed up in one short passage:

"For the fate of the elves is nearly the same
As the pitiful fate of men:
To love; to rue; to be and pursue
A flickering wisp of the fen.
"We must play the game with a careless smile,
Though there's nothing in the hand;
We must toll as if it were worth our while Spinning our ropes of sand;
And laugh and cry, and live and die
At the waft of an unseen wand."

Buckle and his Critics: a Study in Sociology.
By John Mackinnon Robertson. (Sonnensohn.)

THIS is a book in which good and bad qualities are so mingled that it is hard to do full justice to the former without slurring over the latter. It is a solid, honest, and careful piece of work. But then its very solidity is a fault, for it is unquestionably heavy; and, while it is honest, the honesty is that of an enthusiast. Towards the end the writer asks credit "for some judicial comparison of pros and cons, and for a certain measure of impartiality; to which last I pretend on the score of sharing opinions that Buckle disliked and denounced" (p. 546). The ground upon which Mr. Robertson founds the claim to impartiality is an extraordinary one; and that quality is probably among the last which the average reader would ascribe to his book. It is throughout the argument of a partisan. Mr. Robertson is a disciple too intelligent to agree on every point with his master. He knows that it is not given to any man to be right in all things—most of us have sufficient independence for that—and he knows that Buckle himself, had he lived till the present day, must, in the ordinary course of development, have taken a different view of many things. That consistency which maintains unchanged all opinions whatsoever is the monopoly of the inane. But neither where he agrees with Buckle, nor where he differs from him, is Mr. Robertson's tone of mind judicial. One of the points wherein he dissents from Buckle is that whereas the latter was a "Theist, and at times even a sentimental Theist," Mr. Robertson is very much the reverse. Indeed, Theism is to him a red rag. He does not argue the question out; for to have done so, and to have followed the same course with the numerous other subjects touched upon, would have been to enlarge the book beyond all bounds. But if he is right in passing summarily over the subject, he is wrong in permitting himself to speak in a heated and violent tone when ever he refers to it. A man of judicial mind, under such circumstances, would have contented himself with a calm and moderate, though firm, expression of opinion. Mr. Robertson is never calm and never moderate. Wherever Buckle condemns theological tendencies of thought he is warmly praised, wherever he stops short he is condemned.

"Though he makes the extremely inconsistent concession of describing the Hebrew and Christian religions as in themselves superior to the ages in which they were promulgated, his insistence on the impotence of religious teaching to improve a people not already prepared for it leaves him in sharp practical antagonism to the theological spirit. 'The religion of mankind,' he says in so many words, 'is the effect of their improvement, not the cause of it.' And in the concrete cases of Spain and Scotland, with which he dealt at length, he argued with merciless persistence, and with an endless array of proofs, that the religious spirit had only wrought for incivilisation and unhappiness, blighting alike domestic life, culture, and national lustre" (p. 11).

"We are provoked to say, in reading his own [Bishop Stubbs's] pages, What could not such a judgment have done if it had not been added by such a theology? That is what orthodoxy still does for us. But a free man is not doomed to any such self-humiliation; and Buckle at his worst never comes within sight of it" (p. 297).

The man who wrote thus is not a man of judicial mind. The passage last quoted is in bad taste; the previous one is, to say the least, extreme. We need not be orthodox, we need only be unprejudiced, to reject Buckle's weak generalisation, that religion is only the effect, and not likewise the cause, of improvement. Neither need we go deep into philosophy to discover that in human society effects are also causes, and causes are also effects. Doubtless religion is the effect of improvement in the sense that men must have made some advance, must have some rudiments of civilisation and morality, must be at least human before they can be religious. Doubtless they must have made great advances before their religion is worth much. But who except a doctrinaire would deny that religion is in turn a cause? It would surely be in the highest degree absurd to deny the influence of Christianity in elevating the barbarians who overthrew the Roman empire. Even those may admit this influence to the full who do not believe that Christianity is, in Mr. Robertson's sense, "true." Reject all the supernatural part, and there still remain the historical facts, with all their complex effects upon the barbarian tribes. And Buckle's boasted demonstration in "the concrete cases of Spain and Scotland," though it seems to satisfy Mr. Robertson, does not satisfy many students of history. To take the case of Scotland, as the more familiar to me. It is certainly true that religion at various times did mischief there. The Catholic Church before the Reformation was exceedingly corrupt, and undoubtedly did no little harm. Yet the Catholic Church, or Catholic Churchmen, founded three out of four of the Scottish Universities, and had even before the Reformation so far diffused the means of education as to justify the passing of an Act of Parliament in 1496, whereby all barons and freeholders of sufficient wealth were required to send their sons to school till they had acquired "perfytt Latin." The Reformation, too, did harm in many ways. In its after-effects it checked literature and art, and on all the humanist side narrowed and hardened the lives and minds of the people. Yet the Reformation produced one of the most liberal schemes of popular education ever known; and if the scheme was docked and shorn, the fault was not the fault of religion, but rather of the want of it. Buckle's view, and Mr. Robertson's in a still greater degree, is vitiated by the fact that they look almost exclusively at the dark side of the shield. We calmly reject such views the moment we reflect that a similar method of criticism would condemn every human institution that ever existed.

There are in Mr. Robertson's book many evidences of a similar disposition towards other things as well as theology. Another which may be instanced is his tone with respect to universities and the training they give. That the training in question has faults, that it tends to conservatism, and that genius has, as a rule, owed comparatively little to it, most men would probably admit. But this is not enough for Mr. Robertson. He speaks throughout with a contempt of university education and a violent hostility to it that could only be justified in relation to something positively bad.

These are faults of detail, though they are faults of some magnitude. A point of greater importance is that, if we accept Mr. Robertson's own view, he has spent most of his strength and taken up most of his space in the self-imposed task of refuting fools; for the critics of Buckle, according to his showing, are little better than fools. The obvious retort is, that the thing was not worth doing. If Buckle is as great a man as Mr. Robertson supposes, we should be more easily convinced by a serious attempt to prove that his generalisations are right, than by an elaborate examination of the points in which his critics have been wrong. It is true there is much that is positive mingled with Mr. Robertson's negative criticism; but we get the positive conclusions in what is probably the least attractive, the least impressive, and the least intelligible shape. Mr. Robertson is indeed always intelligible in detail, for he is clear-minded; but it is by no means easy to carry away a distinct impression of his work as a whole.

That Mr. Robertson's book is open to these objections is all the more to be regretted because his equipment for the task he has undertaken is in many ways excellent. He has read widely, especially on sociology. He has a keen intelligence, and is master of an incisive logic. He has shown that many at least of the criticisms on Buckle have been hasty and rash. A happier plan, combined with a more urbane temper, would have made the book valuable. As it is, I do not think it is calculated to attract those whom Buckle repels; and to the disciples of Buckle the greater part of it must suggest alaying the slain.

NEW NOVELS.

Married or Single? By B. M. Croker. In 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

Phyllis of Philistia. By F. Frankfort Moore. (Hutchinson.)

The Highland Sister's Promise, &c. By the late Rosa M. Kettle. (Fisher Unwin.)

The Rules of the Game. By Roger Pocock. (Tower Publishing Company.)

A Princess of the Gutter. By L. T. Meade. (Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.)

Shadows on Love's Dial. By the Queen of Roumania. Translated by Helen Wolff. (Downey.)

A Lover of the Day. By Annie Thomas (Mrs. Pender Cudlip). (Digby, Long & Co.)

A Late Awakening. By Maggie Swan. (Ward, Lock & Bowden.)

Mrs. Croker's novel, Married or Single? is all about a mysterious pupil-teacher who behaved very foolishly; though she is by no means the only character in these volumes who did so. Madeline West was a girl of real distinction of appearance, who captivated the heart of a budding barrister, Laurence Wynne. Owing to some peculiar circumstances, for which the young couple were not to blame, they married secretly without means. Consequently, as they decided not to let the world know of their union, the whole narrative turns on the question whether Madeline is married or single. By-and-by her father, who has not been heard of for a long time, turns up as an Australian millionaire, and his daughter dares not tell him of her marriage. She lives in splendour while her husband is painfully making his way at the Bar. In time he succeeds; and when, at the close of many vicissitudes, the Australian becomes aware of the state of the case, instead of bursting forth like a volcano his passion calmly fizzles out, and he accepts the inevitable. Mrs. Croker is always a lively and spirited writer; and although her latest work is in a different vein from previous ones, it is no less interesting. There are passages of natural humour and also of pathos here to hold the reader's attention.

Phyllis of Philistia is brilliant, but the sarcasm and the satire are alike overdone. Mr. Moore gives us no rest. All his characters seem to be tumbling head over heels in their eagerness to "go one better" than each other in saying startling things. There is a clergyman who plays at ninepins with all the sacred characters of the Old Testament, and calls it reforming the Church of England. Nevertheless, there are some fine traits in his nature. Phyllis, the heroine, was engaged to this advanced clergyman; but, horrified at his views, she throws him over, to accept an African explorer who was charged with massacring natives by dynamite. The author is very smart and epigrammatic in hitting off his characters. For example, the Rev. George Holland was no fool, "though he was a fellow of his college." His sneers at the African missionaries, however, create a revulsion of feeling, and there are other things in the course of this volume in bad taste. Mr. Moore must be left to the theatrical managers to defend the statement, that "there's not a theatre manager in London who wouldn't give his best box to a woman who has come straight from the Divorce Court." The whole passage about the Nonconformist Conscience is most offensive to a large section of the community, and ought to be expunged from any future edition. There is a passage also referring to "the member for Mid Battersea," which does Mr. Moore no credit, and is utterly out of place in a novel. But with all its blemishes, the book is one to be read. By the way, "a duel à l'outrance" is not correct French; "It is quite ridiculous, beside being untrue," is not correct English; and the explosive substance melinite is not melanite, as repeatedly given in these pages.

The posthumous sketches of the late Miss R. M. Kettle, The Highland Sister's Promise, &c., are scarcely a fair representation of her skill as a novelist. We remember many of her stories to which these are inferior in grip or in literary talent. As for the verses which appear now and then under the letters "R. M. K.," they should have been left in obscurity. Almost any person with a facility in rhyming could do better. "Under the Laurels" is a prettily told love episode.

A book with stronger lights and shadows than The Rules of the Game is seldom to be met with. Mr. Pocock has evidently seen the wild life on Texas ranches for himself, and great strength and vigour characterise his sketches of Jack Hayle and his friends. What the author lacks is literary finish. The title of the volume refers to the honest and manly rules necessary in playing the game of human life. The hero is an extraordinary character. He roams up and down in the world, performing startling feats in America, Europe, and Africa, before he finally settles down in the West again with Blanche Masterton as his wife. His bride is worthy of him; for she is a woman of pronounced individuality, with a magnificent wealth of affection for the outlawed Jack. There is one very pathetic incident, where a Western cowboy lays down his life to save that of his friend, and in other scenes also the tragic pathos of life plays a conspicuous part. In his Preface, Mr. Pocock claims to have in some degree anticipated the discovery of colour music as an art so far back as the year 1883.

The old, old problem, how to relieve the distress among the teeming myriads of East London, and to raise the sufferers themselves in the scale of existence, forms the groundwork of Mrs. L. T. Meade's story, A Princess of the Gutter. A girl graduate of Girton has a large fortune left to her; but when she finds out that it has been accumulated by grinding down the poor and compelling them to live in dark and disreputable hovels, she resolves that it shall be returned to the victims in the shape of better homes and some of the higher advantages of civilisation. She takes up her abode in the midst of evil and insanitary surroundings, and in spite of rebuffs nobly adheres to her work. This novel is a strong and healthy contrast to the new fiction so much in vogue; and we heartily commend it, both for its good and elevating tone, and for the useful lessons it is calculated to convey to all young people who may study its pages.

The Queen of Roumania ("Carmen Sylva") shows to much greater advantage in her volume of short sketches, Shadows on Love's Dial, than in longer works we have read from her pen: her diffuseness is concentrated with advantage, and her characters and their action are held within control. "A Stray Leaf" is a touching sketch which would do no discredit to authors of a higher range than "Carmen Sylva"; and the same may be said of "A Pen and Ink Confession" and "A Broken Statue." Occasionally the English is defective; and a remarkable feat is chronicled of one of the characters, when we are told that "her hands, which hung listlessly down at her sides, were fast locked in each other."

Mrs. Pender Oudlip's A Lover of the Day is neither better nor worse than the general run of her stories. It is bright and readable enough, but it is far from being high-class literature. Sholto Graham, the lover referred to in the title, is a poor, selfish creature, and the only wonder is that a smart, clever girl like Patrice Laugherne was ever taken in by him for a moment.

The best passages in the story are those relating to Captain Kelly, Patrice's adoptive father; and there is a real touch of pathos in the description of his trials. We have a wicked siren of a widow, with particularly white arms and shoulders, whom Graham finds to be of the irresistible sort. Altogether there is nothing whatever striking in this study of the life of the day.

A cold, self-contained Scotch minister is the central figure in A Late Awakening. An old friend dies, and leaves him in charge of his only child, a bright and inexperienced girl. Not knowing what else to do with her he marries her. Then his mistake begins to appear. The young wife hungers for her husband's love, for she has a wealth of affection in her; but the Rev. Donald Dunbar remains unmoved. He is one of those who believe in restraining the emotions, not encouraging them. His systematic iciness of attitude at length drives his wife from home. She goes through terrible privations, and finally returns with her babe. But before she can be reconciled to her husband she dies; and Dunbar's late awakening comes when the little one is left to his charge. Gradually his child entwines itself round his heart, and brings out all the human nature that has hitherto lain dormant within him. The story is told with tenderness and sympathy, but we did not perceive the necessity for killing off the poor wife.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

THREE BOOKS ON EASTERN EUROPE.

Russian Politics. By Herbert M. Thompson. (Fisher Unwin.) Mr. Thompson attempts in this book to put the English reader in a position to understand the conditions of life and the problems of government that exist in Russia of to-day. He may be congratulated on having succeeded in the attempt. He properly considers some knowledge of the physical aspects of the country and of the ethnological descent of its inhabitants, as well as of the history of the Empire, necessary as a preliminary to such understanding. He quotes the remark of Humboldt, that the part of our globe governed by the Russian sceptre is larger than the area which the moon exhibits to us at its full. Another physical peculiarity, of which few Englishmen are aware, is that if you cut off Lapland and Finland you have a singular uniformity of climate throughout European Russia. There is, of course, a difference in the respective lengths of the cold and of the hot seasons at Archangel and Taganrog; the ports of the Azof are not frozen for so long a period as those of the Baltic. Archangel, though on the White Sea, happens to be just outside the Arctic zone, and within the forest zone, which from the 65th degree of latitude spreads southward as far southwest as Kieff. The two obstacles to Russian material progress are, in fact, more apparent than real—cold and immensity of space. All history tells us that the conquering races emerge from the North and never from tropical forests, while immensity of space is nothing less than an immense boon. We may mention here the five excellent maps which illustrate Mr. Thompson's text. Ethnologically, Russia is peculiar in possessing more subjects of the Turanian stock so called than any other European kingdom except Hungary. We refer to the Finns, who rival their cousins of Hungary in their capacity and intelligence. The Finns are Protestants, while among Hungarians Protestants are in a minority. Mr. Thompson takes a far more favourable view of the Russian peasant than the well-known Lanin; but even he admits that the peasantry of Finland contrast favourably with the bulk of the people in Russia proper. The historical sketch down to the death of Nicholas I. calls for no particular comment. The reforms of the early years of Alexander II. have been treated very fully, as the author considers the political questions of the present day intimately connected with them and with their subsequent partial abrogation. This especially refers to the Zemstvos, or local governing bodies, which were established in 1864. The business of the Zemstvo is mainly carried on by a permanent assembly, formerly elected freely by the whole of the Zemstvo. Latterly, the Imperial Government has usurped powers which practically reduce local government in Russia to a farce. The book is stuffed with quotations from M. Leroy-Beaulieu's monumental work, and Mr. Thompson may be congratulated on the selection of such a guide. His other guide is Mr. Felix Volkhovskiy, whose knowledge of Russia is not less encyclopaedic than the French historian's. A chapter is devoted to religious and religious persecutions. It is a curious fact that, twenty years ago, the Russian Orthodox Church enjoyed the reputation of being one of the most tolerant in Europe; and yet, even then, it did not merit this good character. The only dissenters that the Orthodox Church has ever tolerated with any degree of goodwill have been the actual pagans, from the frozen North, and the Mohammedans. Neither of these can be charged with the crime of attempting to pervert others from the Orthodox faith. To speak plainly, the vaunted toleration of the Russian Government has always been of a peculiar character. No dissenting body has suffered more than the Uniate, and yet they differ from their Orthodox brethren only in acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope of Rome. M. Leroy-Beaulieu tells us that "everything was put in operation against them—fines, imprisonment, flogging, confiscation of their property, exile, and torture." We are a Protestant people, and the martyrdom of the Uniat Church appealed but slightly to British sympathies. It is otherwise with the martyrdom of the Reforming bodies. About the same time (1877) as the Uniat persecution the persecution of the Stundists began, and has continued, increasing in cruelty, to the present day. The Stundists are, roughly speaking, a quarter of a million of peasants; the Jews are five or six millions. Mr. Thompson tells the pitiful tale of Jew-baiting with sympathy and moderation. Here the Russian Government have appealed to what is worst in human nature, and though they have escaped being sent to Coventry by the French and English Hebrew capitalists, they have not escaped economic punishment. The harrying of the Jews is generally admitted to be one of the causes of the growth of poverty of the Russian people. M. Ewers mentions that, after the expulsion of the Jews from Moscow, the rate of interest in private pawnshops rose from 25 to 200 per cent. per annum. The three concluding chapters deal with some of the dramatis personae on the Russian stage, with the extradition of prisoners to Russia, and with the question, "How long the many must endure the one?" Mr. Thompson's readers will not all agree with him in his answer to that question, but all will feel that this book is written in a most careful and conscientious spirit.

Life on the Bosphorus. By William J. J. Spry, R.N. (Nichols.) This book consists of two parts—the first of 244 pages, the second of 330. The first part is devoted to a description of the City of the Sultan and of the mock trial of Midhat Pasha; the second part is entitled "Chronicles of the Caliphs," and contains a sketch of Ottoman history. It is needless to say that the latter is by far the more interesting portion of the work. What gives Mr. Spry's book its special interest is not the letterpress, but the illustrations. The volume is well illustrated throughout, but we especially refer to the portraits of the thirty-four Sultans who have been girded with the sword of Othman. This gallery is in itself a lesson in history. The spirit in which these chronicles are written is set forth in the concluding sentence: "We can, in conclusion, but hope that Sultan Abdul Hamid II. may be long spared and enabled to guide his people through all their troubles, preparing for them an era of progress and happiness, and for himself an undying name as saviour of his country." By way of commentary on this eulogy we turn over the pages of the Appendix, and find the text of the scheme presented by the Powers to the Porte on June 4, 1895, accompanied by a map showing the scene of the massacres in August, 1894. Having read Mr. Spry's own version of Turkish history, our wonder is not that Abdul Hamid II. is as weak as he is, but that he is not more weak and more despotic. Thanks, however, to his portraits, Mr. Spry may be congratulated on having compiled a book which no library on the Eastern Question should be without.

Israel among the Nations. By A. Leroy-Beaulieu. Translated by Frances Hellmann. (Heinemann.) This is a translation of M. Leroy-Beaulieu's well-known study of the Jews and anti-Semitism, in which the charm of style of the original has not been lost. The author has added an introduction to the English version. Referring to what German anti-Semites call the "Judaizing" of modern society, M. Leroy-Beaulieu thinks this might be more correctly called the "Americanising" of morals. He regards the ascendancy of material interests, the greed for money, the frantic race for wealth, as the result of our social conditions. As he eloquently says:

"It is not by proscribing any particular race or any particular faith, but only by appealing to moral forces, and by bringing all such forces to their highest development, that our modern democracies can escape from the practical materialism that threatens to engulf them."

This translation of a most interesting and suggestive book can be recommended.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. JOHN MURRAY announces The Life and Letters of Samuel Butler, D.D., the famous headmaster of Shrewsbury for thirty-eight years, and afterwards for a short time Bishop of Lichfield, by his grandson, Mr. Samuel Butler, author of "Erewhon." The author's object has been to illustrate the scholastic, religious, and social life of England at the end of last century and the beginning of the present. He will print in full an account of the inner condition of Rugby, written by Dr. James (headmaster from 1780 to 1794) for the use of Dr. Butler, his favourite pupil; and will also quote freely from the episcopal correspondence. The work is to be in two volumes, illustrated with portraits.

MESSRS. RERVES & TURNER will publish, in the course of the next two or three weeks, Ann Morgan's Love: a Pedestrian Poem, by Mr. Arthur Munby, the author of "Dorothy." It is a story of a rustic mésalliance, the bridegroom being a cultivated man and the bride a robust and dialect-speaking servant lass; and the author's purpose is to show—as he has tried to show before—that such a woman may be a worthier mate for such a man than the trivial misses of the upper or middle ranks.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. are preparing for early publication The Home Rule Parliament, by Mr. H. W. Lucy, as a companion volume to the "Gladstone" and "Salisbury" Parliaments.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS will publish shortly an historical book on The West Indies and the Spanish Main, by Mr. James Rodway, who is, we believe, an old resident in British Guiana.

MESSRS. OLIPHANT, ANDERSON, & FERRIER are preparing for early publication a book by the Rev. Samuel Graham Watson, for fifteen years a missionary of the American Presbyterian Board in Persia, to be entitled Persian Life and Customs, with incidents of residence and travel in the Land of the Lion and the Sun. It will contain a map showing the author's journeys, and numerous illustrations from photographs.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. announce Through the Buffer State, by Surgeon-Major MacGregor, with illustrations.

MESSRS. A. D. INNES & Co. announce, for publication in the spring, Battles on English Ground, written and illustrated by Mr. C. R. B. Barrett; and a volume on Shakespeare's Flowers, by Mr. Phil Robinson, with illustrations.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. have in preparation a new book by the Amateur Angler, to be called By Meadow and Stream: Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Places. It will be issued at a popular price; but there is also to be a large paper edition, with India proofs of the illustrations.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. will publish immediately the following novels, each in one volume: I Loved Her Once, by John Strange Winter, and My Love Noel, by Mr. Hume Nisbet.

MESSRS. EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE have in the press a memorial edition of The Student's Handbook of the Psalms, by the late Dr. Sharpe, rector of Elmley Lovett, near Droitwich, who died just two months ago. It will have a memoir, written by his old friend, the Rev. Dr. Sinker, librarian of Trinity College, Cambridge.

MR. GEORGE ALLEN will publish shortly a third edition of Ruskin's Letters to the Clergy on the Lord's Prayer and the Church, which has been out of print for nearly fifteen years. It is edited by the Rev. S. A. Mallett, who has been permitted to add several fresh letters by Mr. Ruskin, while he has reduced the number of those by the clergy and laity.

CANON LINTON is about to issue, through Mr. Elliot Stock, a revised edition of his work on Christ in the Old Testament.

THERE will be published very shortly, as a new volume in the "Westminster Gazette Library," In the Evening of his Days: a Study of Mr. Gladstone in Retirement, with some Account of St. Deiniol's Library and Hostel, illustrated with photographs and sketches. The book will be issued uniform with the "Homes and Haunts of Thomas Carlyle."

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will complete his popular edition of Canon Jessopp's works by the issue of the last published volume, Random Roaming, in a cheap form. We are somewhat surprised to learn that The Coming of the Friars shows a larger demand even than Arctady.

MR. HECTOR C. MACPHERSON, author of Thomas Carlyle, the first volume of Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier's "Famous Scots Series," to be published on February 11, is the editor of the Edinburgh Evening News.

MESSRS. W. DRYSDALE & Co., of Montreal announce the publication of a companion volume to Men of the Times, being a biographical dictionary of Canadians who have distinguished themselves either in the Dominion or elsewhere. The compiler is Mr. Henry J. Morgan, of Ottawa.

WE understand that Lord Windsor, Mr. George Wyndham, and Mr. Charles Baxter (so intimately identified with the late R. L. Stevenson) have joined the board of directors of the New Review, which already includes Sir Herbert Stephen and Mr. Harry Cust.

A MEETING of the Jewish Historical Society of England will be held in the rooms of the Maccabaeans, St. James's Hall Restaurant, Piccadilly, on Sunday next, at 8.30 p.m. This meeting is the third commemoration of the resettlement of the Jews in England, under the Commonwealth. There will be on exhibition a collection of prints and books bearing on the readmission of the Jews; and the following papers will be read: "Joseph Ibn Danon, of Belgrade," by Prof. Dr. David Kaufman; "Stages in the Parliamentary Emancipation of the Jews of England," by Mr. Oswald J. Simon; and "Moyse Hall, Bury St. Edmunds: whence its name, what it was, and what it was not," by Mr. F. Hare.

AT the meeting of the English Goethe Society, to be held on Wednesday next in the gallery of the Royal Society of British Artists, a paper will be read on "Hermann Sudermann," by Mr. R. G. Alford.

AT the meeting of the Toynbee Library Readers' Union, to be held on Tuesday next, Mr. G. Lawrence Gomme, late president of the Folk-lore Society, will read a paper on "The Study of Popular Custom and Belief."

THE first fascicule of the new series of the Archives Historiques de la Gascogne contains the "Memoires du Marquis de Frandieu" (1680-1745), excellently edited, with introduction and notes, by Louis de Germon. The biography is of the lighter kind, but has important particulars about the War of Succession, and about the Court of Philip V. of Spain, and also gives a lovely picture of the life of a country nobleman in the South of France of that date.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE report of a committee appointed by the council upon the question of admitting women to the degree of B.A. is printed in the Oxford University Gazette. After hearing much evidence, both oral and in writing, from ladies experienced in teaching, the committee passed the two following resolutions:

"The committee think it possible that the want of a degree may occasionally have proved a disadvantage to Oxford candidates [for mistresseships]; but the evidence given does not satisfy it that cases of hardship have been of frequent occurrence.

"We believe that a stricter course of study would in almost all cases be preferable to the indefiniteness of the existing arrangements for women students; and we think this advantage may be secured by granting the degree, without abolishing the freedom of choice now permitted."

According, a series of resolutions will be submitted to Congregation on March 3, proposing: (1) to give the degree of B.A. to women under certain restrictions, or (2), in the alternative, to give them only a diploma, and (3), in any event, to give them a certificate stating the terms they have kept and the examinations they have passed.

IN Congregation at Oxford next Tuesday, a statute will be promulgated, constituting the office of Ford's lecturer in English history. The lecturer is required to deliver not less than six lectures, for which he will receive £100. The appointment is for one year only, and no lecturer may be re-appointed until after an interval of three years.

THE treasurers of the Robertson Smith memorial fund report that, after investing sufficient to provide £30 a year for the maintenance and extension of the library bequeathed by the late professor to Christ's College, a balance of £335 has been handed over for the purchase of Oriental MSS. for the University Library. The total amount of subscriptions was £1475.

MR. ARTHUR J. EVANS, keeper of the Ashmolean Museum, at Oxford, announces a course of six lectures, to be delivered during the present month, on "The Origins of Celtic Art."

At a meeting held in the library of the Divinity School at Cambridge, on Friday of this week, the Rev. C. H. W. Johns, of Queens' College, was to read a paper, entitled "Some recent Contributions of Assyriology to Biblical History."

At the first meeting of the Oxford Architectural and Historical Society, to be held on Tuesday next, a paper will be read by Mr. Ralph Nevill on "Parochial Registers and Records"; and resolutions will be proposed respecting the preservation of these and other ancient monuments in the neighbourhood of Oxford.

THE Rev. Dr. E. Moore, Principal of St. Edmund Hall, the Barlow Lecturer at University College, London, proposes to lecture during the current year upon the Purgatorio. The lectures will be given on the last three Wednesdays and Thursdays in February and May, at 3 p.m. The two lectures on February 12 and February 13 will be introductory, the subject being "The Unity and Symmetry of the Plan of the Purgatorio." The remaining lectures will consist of readings on the earlier Cantos of the Purgatorio (so far as time will permit), including translation, notes, and illustrations.

MR. GEORGE ST. CLAIR will deliver a course of five public lectures at Manchester College, Oxford, commencing on Wednesday next, upon "Biblical Topography in the light of Recent Research," illustrated with maps, charts, and diagrams.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

IN MEMORY OF LORD LEIGHTON, PRESIDENT OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

CITY of Lilies, by the Arno's tide,
Thou hast remembered well six hundred years
The glad procession and triumphant cheers
That went with Cimabue, in its pride,
To bear the Mother of the Crucified
To Ruocella's altar; now with tears,
Not soon to pass, thy heart in sorrow hears
How he who told thy triumphing has died.
For of thy sons a son, tho' Western born,
He worked with Leonardo, had the fear
Of mighty Raphael still before his eyes.
He mixed his colours with the golden morn,
And, finding lack of gorgeous glory here,
He has gone forth right glad to Paradise.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for February is a good number. Prof. Sanday, with an urbanity which some other theologians would do well to copy, discriminates between the more and the less convincing portions of Prof. Ramsay's historical reconstruction in his "St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen." The latter writer himself gives an instructive essay on the term "lawful assembly" in Acts xix. 39 (A.V.), changed, as he thinks, unadvisedly by the Revisers into "regular assembly." Dr. E. A. Abbott bids us reconsider the date of the Epistle of the Gallican churches in the second century. According to him, the date is the seventeenth year of Antoninus Pius (i.e., 155 A.D.). A short expository paper by the late Dr. Dale, on the expression, "A Spiritual Hour" (1 Peter ii. 5), together with Dr. Bruce's paper on Mark's realism, represent the popular exegetical element in current theology. Dr. Edkins examines the use of the term shōterim (A.V. officers). Mr. Cross has a note on the "Theology of the Fourth Gospel." Dr. Marcus Dods gives his usual survey of recent Biblical literature.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A MS. OF THE "DIVINA COMMEDIA" IN A LISBON LIBRARY.

Jesus College, Oxford: Jan. 20, 1896.

As I explained in my former letter, I devoted some attention to a Dante MS. in the Bibliotheca Nacional. This MS. has long been known to exist in Lisbon, and is, so far as I can judge, the only MS. of any part of Dante's works in Portugal. But it has been erroneously described in Catalogues, being said to contain the Inferno and Paradiso only, whereas, with a slight exception, it contains the whole poem and more also. The following is its description.

It is written on both sides of 102 leaves of thick parchment (10 inches by 7½). The initial letter of every canto is illuminated on a blue ground of about a quarter of an inch square; the first letter of every terzina is a small capital, alternately red and blue; the initial letter of every other line is touched with red. Every canto is numbered, and (except in the Purgatorio and once or twice in the Paradiso) has a rubric giving the subject of the verses following. The first page of the Purgatorio, and also that of the Paradiso, are richly illuminated; the first leaf of the Inferno has been cut away, evidently for the sake of the illumination. The MS. begins with the seventh line of Canto ii. of the Inferno (O Musa, &c.). The binding is recent and poor. The latter part of the MS. is in some places difficult to read, as it has suffered from damp. On the whole, however, it is in good condition, and is fairly legible. The press-mark is "MSS. Illum. 55."

It is not known how or when this MS. came into the possession of the Library. On one of the pages is inscribed the word "Beja," and hence it is somewhat hastily inferred that the MS. was presented by the Bishop of Beja either to the Bibliotheca or to some library now absorbed in it. There is a tradition in the Library that the MS. was written in Spain, but to support this theory there is only one piece of internal evidence, to be adduced later. The peculiarities of spelling which occur, and have been supposed to be Spanish, are also to be found in MSS. of known Italian origin. The date assigned to the MS. by its custodians is the end of the fourteenth or the beginning of the fifteenth century.

As the MS. seemed remarkable, I wrote to Dr. Moore, the editor of the "Oxford Dante," and received from him a long list of passages containing crucial readings, &c. In all these passages I sent to him the reading of the MS., and his opinion is that this MS. is not of much importance for the text of the "Divina Commedia": it accords with the great bulk of MSS., and does not belong to any small or distinctive family.

I have also submitted photographs of several pages of the MS. to good judges of paleography, and the result has been to confirm my opinion of its antiquity: it is probably as old as any Dante MS. in the Bodleian, and therefore certainly of the fourteenth century. Dr. Moore (speaking only from memory) thought that it resembled a MS. in the British Museum dated 1379.

After these special researches, I took a general survey of the MS. and observed that what I supposed to be the final canto of the Paradiso did not end with the familiar words. On reading the rubric I found that it did not give the subjects of the following verses, but ran as follows (contractions being expanded):

"Explicit III<sup>a</sup> cantio comedie dantis allegorij de florentia quae est de paradiso et incipit divisio a qualitate partium comedie dicti dantis facte per jacobum filium dicti dantis cujus anima requiescat in pace."

It must be borne in mind that this rubric is exactly like the rubrics which occur at the head of each canto, and the verses which follow are written with as much care and ornament as the verses of the poem.

This is the one piece of internal evidence which is supposed to indicate that the scribe was ignorant of both the Latin and the Italian languages. But this is a point which must not be unduly pressed, as the ignorance and unintelligence of transcribers are continually denounced in catalogues of Dante MSS.

The verses which follow the rubric are what is known as the "Capitolo of Jacopo." I must confess that I was unaware of its existence, and my first impression was that I had made a discovery. On referring, however, to Lord Vernon's fine edition of Dante, I found (vol. iii., p. 22) that this Capitolo was printed in Venice as early as 1477 by Vindelin de Spira, at the end of his folio edition of the "Divina Commedia." Dante scholars are now so vigilant and numerous that it is impossible even for a beginner to make a discovery. But outside the circle of Dante scholars the existence of Jacopo's Capitolo is not well known. It is a work of little merit. From the first line (an adaptation of the first line of Canto ii. of the Paradiso) to the one hundred and fifty-fourth line (a parody of the first line of the Inferno) there is not a sign of ability, nothing but a prosaic and somewhat confused index in terza rima of the subjects of the great poem. Transcribers therefore and editors have not been careful to reproduce this composition. They have apparently considered that it would be a bad compliment to the poet to call public attention to the fact that genius is not hereditary.

But though the Capitolo is a poor performance, it may be of use to us in tracing the source of the Lisbon MS. Its position and the mode of its introduction are remarkable. If the experience and knowledge of some Dante scholar can direct us to an early MS. in which the Capitolo occurs in the same position and with the same rubrics as in the Lisbon MS., we shall probably have discovered its foundation text.

I have been able to examine only the Bodleian MSS., but in Dr. Moore's book on The Textual Criticism of the Divina Commedia details are given of many more. As I have tested his accuracy in the documents which I have seen, I am sure that I can trust it in the rest. The number of Bodleian MSS. of the "Divina Commedia" is fourteen, and most of them contain the whole poem. In only one of these is the Capitolo given entire. It is in the fine illuminated MS. Canon Ital. 109 (Colomb de Batines 493). Here the Capitolo comes at the close of the Paradiso, but with an interval and without a rubric. The number of lines is the same as in the Lisbon MS., but there are many different readings. It is followed by the Credo and other pieces commonly appended. Two other MSS. give portions of the Capitolo, but not in the same position or with the same rubrics as in the Lisbon MS.

After deducting the Bodleian MSS., we find in Dr. Moore's book an account of more than 220 MSS. "examined and collated"—most of them by Dr. Moore himself. Of all these there are only two which give the Capitolo immediately after the Paradiso, without abridgment and alone.* Such a fact needs no comment. Of these two, one (in the British Museum, 943 Egerton, Col. Bat. 557) is old enough to be the original of the Lisbon MS. But it is probably not so; otherwise the rubrics, which are remarkable, would have been quoted. For the Capitolo in the Lisbon MS. has not only a rubric at the beginning but a colophon at the end. It is as follows:

"Detur pro penna scriptori gratia vestra."

I have shown this to many scholars of wide experience in medieval MSS., and they all say that they have not met with it before. I am therefore anxious to learn whether any one of your readers has found it appended, not to a Dante MS., but to any MS. whatsoever.

I cannot leave this part of my subject without expressing my admiration for the skill and accuracy which Dr. Moore has shown in the difficult task of describing so many MSS. His labour and patience have been rewarded by a singular absence of those accidental errors which are apt to occur in the printing of such complicated details.

The Bodleian is very rich in early printed editions of the "Divina Commedia," some of them splendid specimens of Italian typography. I have examined all these up to the date 1595, and I have not found Jacopo's Capitolo given in any copy except the Venetian edition of 1477 above mentioned. In this edition it follows the Paradiso, but at an interval and with a rubric quite different from that of the Lisbon MS.; it differs also in numerous readings, it omits a terzina, and is followed by the Credo and other usual appendices.

At the risk of repetition, I conclude by stating the requirements which we desire in the MS. for which we are seeking.

It must be (1) of earlier date than the fifteenth century; it must contain (2) Jacopo's Capitolo, (3) immediately following the Paradiso, (4) entire, (5) alone, and (6) with both rubrics given above.

If we succeed in this quest, we shall have good hopes of pointing out to the Lisbonians the source of their Dante treasure.

THE VARIOUS FORMS OF O.E. "CEASTER."

Oxford: Jan. 29, 1896.

It is a well-known fact that the name for a Roman military station, castra, has had in English a twofold development. In the Anglian dialect of the North the original k sound of the initial was preserved before the unchanged vowel a, hence "Lancaster," "Doncaster." In the Saxon and Mercian dialects the k sound was palatalised before the vowel, which had become e, hence the O.E. forms ceaster (ceaster, cester), found in "Chester," "Winchester," "Olcchester." The Anglian form has remained essentially unchanged to the present day, the only variant from cester being the East Anglian "Caistor." On the other hand, the O.E. form ceaster (cester) is represented in modern English by various forms in addition to its regular representative "chester," as well as by some pronunciations not in every case consistent with these forms. In the first place, we find in what was once Mercian territory, in the modern names of towns, the frequent spelling cester, as in "Worcester," "Gloucester," "Bicester," "Leicester," "Cirencester." This spelling cester cannot, of course, represent the sound of the Mercian cester, since palatalised O.E. c is sounded regularly ch (as in chaff) in modern English. The explanation of the spelling cester (as in "Worcester") is doubtless that French scribes, employing the Mercian form, pronounced it not in the English, but in the French way.

Secondly, we find, in what was once Mercia and Wessex, the spellings "Uttoxeter," "Wroxeter," "Exeter," by the side of which we may place the pronunciation Ciester, representing the written "Cirencester." These names of towns ending in -eter, contain the element cester, which is a later French pronunciation of cester, the s going out before t, as in être for O.F. estre; compare particularly Bicêtre, a French pronunciation of "Winchester."

It is not clear how it has come to pass that on the one hand Exanester should have given "Exeter," and on the other hand Ligeracester, Wigeracester should have given "Leicester" (pronounced Lester), "Worcester" (pronounced Wuster). It may be noted in passing that this French -cester is never pronounced in modern English: it has either become (c)ester or ster. The pronunciation ster may be explained in two different ways. (1) In Ligeracester, Wigeracester, the French cester may have had the secondary accent on the final syllable. The penultimate syllable being thus left without stress would lose its vowel, -cester thus becoming -ster. If this explanation be correct, both the spelling "Leicester" and the pronunciation Lester represent an earlier French pronunciation of the Mercian cester than does the form "Exeter." (2) Or it may be that the pronunciation Lester stands for an earlier Leicester (like "Exeter"), with syncope of the vowel in the unstressed penultimate. But this hypothesis entails the difficulty of the retention of the historic spelling -cester, in spite of the intervening -eter stage.

A. L. MAYHEW.

P.S.—Since writing the above it has occurred to me that the difference between the type "Exeter" and the type "Worcester" may be accounted for in this way. Exeter < Exceter < Exêtre < Excestre represents the French pronunciation of O.E. Ex(an)ce(a)stre in the oblique case. "Worcester," on the other hand, contains cester, O.E. ce(a)ster in the nominative.

ALEXANDER MACMILLAN.

London: Feb. 2, 1896.

With your remarks upon the late Mr. A. Macmillan it is a pleasure to express cordial agreement. For thirty years and more I had the good fortune to find in him a publisher at once shrewd and liberal, and an ever constant friend.

But I do not write to offer sentiments which will be very widely felt. Let me point out a practice—little in appearance, but of great value—within the last few years followed by this firm: that of including in each book a printed enumeration of the dates of appearance and of successive editions. This not only enables the book to carry its own history with it, and its place in the author's work, thus greatly aiding bibliography, but adds a distinct gain to the reader. How often, in its absence, has he to try to discover by internal evidence when the book was written?—a fact which, it is almost needless to remark, is often, more or less, a criterion of the value of its statements; or, in case of poetry or novels, an obvious source of interest.

Perhaps even this slight notice may induce other publishers to follow suit. Books thus dated surely stand at once on a better footing than the mass, and especially above those presenting that converse bad method of publication, without even the date of issue, which we too often meet with.

EUROPEAN LADIES IN BASHAN.

MADRID: Jan. 12, 1896.

In his review of A Visit to Bashan and Argob by Major Heber-Percy in the ACADEMY, of December 7, Prof. Sayce says:

"Mrs. Heber-Percy enjoys the distinction of being the first European lady who has ventured into the volcanic wilds of Bashan, undeterred by the fear of the Bedouin who infest certain parts of the district."

This statement is inaccurate if, as appears from the review, it is only about a year since Major Heber-Percy's party visited Bashan. Two Scottish ladies—Mrs. J. C. Macphail, from Edinburgh, and Mrs. F. Mackinnon, from Damascus—were members of a party of seven who in the spring of 1890 traversed the Lejjah and visited Kanawat, Bostra, and Geraah.

It is a matter of no great importance; but as a reference to the fact that these were probably the first European ladies to travel through Bashan in modern times appears in an article on Damascus in the December number of the Free Church of Scotland Monthly, it is desirable that Prof. Sayce's statement should be corrected.

SCIENCE.

A Short Study of Ethics. By Charles F. D'Arcy, B.D. (Macmillans.)

MR. D'ARCY considers that the one serious drawback to recent works on Ethics is that they build without a foundation. Prof. Dewey, Mr. Muirhead, and Mr. Mackenzie have all avoided any expressly metaphysical chapters in their handbooks. Mr. D'Arcy's book, therefore,

"endeavours to give, in small space, an account as well of the metaphysical basis as of the ethical superstructure;" and it aims at "engaging the attention of readers who may be repelled by the formidable bulk and difficulty of the great works which give to these questions a more elaborate consideration."

It may be doubted, at the outset, whether Mr. D'Arcy was justified in making so hazardous an attempt. It is probably not without reason that recent writers on Ethics have left out metaphysics so far as possible. A little metaphysical knowledge is, for a beginner, of all superficial knowledge the most deluding; and in writing a treatise on Ethics the policy of all or nothing is the only safe one. Ultimate questions must either be treated exhaustively, as in the Prolegomena; or, if the book is to be a genuine Introduction, the author should wisely be content to rely solely on that καλή παιδεία which Aristotle declared to be of absolute necessity. In Mr. D'Arcy's book the metaphysical part, while too difficult to serve as an Introduction, is too condensed to do more than perplex the more advanced reader; and that criticism of opposing theories, which in most recent books occupies so large a space, is, with Mr. D'Arcy, so short as to be almost valueless. Less than half-a-dozen pages for each suffice to condemn the Intuitionist and Utilitarian heresies; and after little more than the same number of pages in the metaphysical Part I., the reader is supposed to be able to grasp the conclusion that "things exist only in so far as they are due to the synthetic activity of the knowing subject!"

Considered, then, as an Introduction to Ethics, Mr. D'Arcy's book can scarcely be called successful. And if it is to be criticised as an original contribution to Ethical thought, the "metaphysical basis" provided is so sketchy and tentative as almost to invite misunderstandings. For example, when Mr. D'Arcy, in the chapter on Will (perhaps the best in the book), argues that "from the fact that it is only when the self, by an act of attention, has directed itself towards anything, that that thing can enter experience, coupled with the fact that every element in experience depends, for its very existence, upon the principle of relation . . . it is plain that even sensation . . . owes its existence to the active determination of spirit," obviously the validity of his argument wholly depends upon the meaning attached to the word "attention." Left as it is, and without further discussion, the argument is neither more nor less than a petitio principii.

Mr. D'Arcy's main motive seems to have been the time-honoured desire to reconcile theology and metaphysics. His manner of effecting the reconciliation is to appeal to theology when philosophy breaks down. His whole position is simply a development of St. Augustine's saying that the Divine Being "sciendo ignoratur et nesciendo cognoscitur"; for whenever he has reduced thought to a state of utter helplessness he can always find a safe refuge in the Divine omniscience and omnipotence. Mr. D'Arcy begins by accepting some of the main conclusions of the Prolegomena. Things owe their existence to the active determination of spirit: the individual's experience must be recognised as part of the great cosmos of Nature: just as the individual's experience depends upon spirit, so there is a Spirit informing the cosmos of Nature. The first few chapters are thus simply Green recapitulated. But when Green goes on, as Mr. D'Arcy thinks, to identify the World Spirit with the individual's, he refuses to follow him. For when Green spoke of an eternal consciousness making an animal organism its vehicle, Mr. D'Arcy considers that he either deprived man of all real selfhood by making him a mere vehicle, or he identified the self in every man with God. He refuses to tax Green with making the first mistake, and his theology will not allow him to accept the other alternative. Mr. D'Arcy is obliged, therefore, borrowing chiefly from Prof.

Seth's and Mr. Balfour's criticisms of Idealism, to strike out a new theory concerning the subject self. Men are no longer to be considered bound together by the presence of a common rationality, the working in them of an eternal consciousness, but each individual subject is unique and self-centred.

"Every person is separated from every other person by an abyss which thought cannot bridge; and any doctrine which leads to the identification of all persons reduces itself thereby to an absurdity." "Self is for every man unique and ultimate." "The one instance of a plurality which the self cannot unify is the plurality of selves."

And when, after adopting this position, Mr. D'Arcy comes to explain the ordinary facts of morality, he still feels no difficulty. He freely admits that there is no reason why we should be unselfish. Indeed, he willingly accepts Mr. Kidd's contention that reason is essentially anti-social.

"Why should the individual subordinate his private interests to the interests of the community? Why should he deny himself pleasure that others may benefit? No purely reasonable answer can be given to these questions. If they are to be answered at all the answer must to some extent, at all events, transcend reason."

The way Mr. D'Arcy transcends reason is by appealing to God. He tells us that "thought contains no principle capable of unifying a subjective multiplicity. It is necessary, therefore, to suppose that there is in God a transcendent principle by which He forms the ultimate bond of union among the multitude of persons."

"As Person He gives possibility to Nature; as more than Person He gives possibility to the multitude of spirits."

It will be scarcely necessary to point out the convenience of such a form of argument. An appeal to God as "more than Person" is capable of explaining most difficulties. But whether it be an argument of serious philosophic value is another question. It is one thing to find in the Absolute the full manifestation of that which is now seen only dimly; it is another thing to base an appeal to the Absolute on the acknowledged futility of human reason. To appeal to God when thought is helpless and then make the Divine Being the principle of thought's explanation is, in the last resort, only to expound ignotum per ignotius. Moreover, it may be doubted whether Mr. D'Arcy is really entitled to the results he has reached. He goes so far with Green in the first few chapters that it is difficult to see how he can well avoid going farther. We have said that he takes without a murmur the two great leaps which every Idealist theory must take—the leap from the individual's experience to Nature, and the leap from the individual as subject unifying that experience to God, the informing principle of the universe. But, having gone thus far, it is difficult to see why he refuses to allow us to pass from knowledge of ourselves as subjects to knowledge of other subject selves. It cannot be denied that other people enter into the individual's experience; for to do so would be to make the mistake of Solipsism of which Mr. D'Arcy is so much afraid; and if it be urged that we can never hope to have complete knowledge of any other man's soul, then the same remark applies to our knowledge of everything. No object of knowledge can ever be exhausted. Moreover, if, as is probable, the real reason is that Mr. D'Arcy is afraid of identifying the Divine Spirit with the human, it may be answered that, just as much as Green, he has already done so. For if, as he allows, the individual's experience is identical with a part of the cosmos of Nature, then the spirit informing both must be one and the same.

"With a part of Nature, the cosmos of experience, we are intimately acquainted, and our acquaintance with that part proves that natural things exist only as they are constituted by spirit. Natural things depend upon spirit for their very possibility. Nature as a whole, then, exists only on condition that there is Spirit to constitute it. In other words, if Nature is a fact, God is. God is Spirit because Nature exists."

That is to say, the only way by which Mr. D'Arcy is able to mark his sense of the transition from man to God is by the substitution of a large for a small letter!

The fact is, Mr. D'Arcy has been misled by his logic: his "subject self" is an impossible one. If you leave the knowing subject nothing to know, the phrase becomes meaningless. Yet this is precisely what Mr. D'Arcy does when he says that "the subject can abstract from the concrete and remain still the same self identical subject as before." He reduces the individual to a state of self-centred isolation, the logical result of which is not a confident appeal to religion but the despair of absolute scepticism. Whatever were Green's confusions, he was at all events true to facts. He saw that the whole history of language, institutions, in effect the existence of life at all, depended on the possibility of man knowing man and acting unselfishly towards him. And if he did not explain everything, if his eternal consciousness seems sometimes fantastic in its workings, still, as Mr. D'Arcy himself says, "we are not so committed to the Hegelian conception of the spiritual principle as to expect to understand all mysteries."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SYRIAC GOSPELS ON MOUNT SINAI.

Cambridge: Feb. 1, 1896.

Mr. F. C. Conybeare will, I am sure, be pleased to learn that there is an incorrect statement in the last paragraph of his interesting article in the ACADEMY of February 1.

The text of Matt. xii. 29 and of Mark iii. 27 in the Syriac Gospels on Mount Sinai is not lost. The former, it is true, has not been deciphered, but it exists. The latter is included in the fresh transcription which is about to be published. It reads:

"No man can enter into the house of a strong man and spoil his goods, except he will first bind the strong man, and then . . . his goods."

SCIENCE NOTES.

SIR WILLIAM FLOWER has been elected a foreign member of the Royal Swedish Academy, in the place of the late Prof. Huxley; Prof. J. J. Sylvester an associate of the Royal Academy of Belgium; and Prof. Ray Lankester a corresponding member of St. Petersburg Academy.

THE annual general meeting of the Physical Society will be held on Friday next, at 5 p.m., in the rooms of the Chemical Society at Burlington House.

DR. W. R. GOWERS has been appointed Bradshaw Lecturer at the Royal College of Physicians for the current year.

INVESTIGATIONS have recently been undertaken by the Marine Biological Association into the contents of certain bays on the south coast of Devon. The bays selected for the investigations were Start and Teignmouth Bays, both of which are closed to trawlers in accordance with a by-law of the Devon Sea Fisheries Committee. The object in view of which the work was begun was to discover the characteristic features of the localities in question in respect of the food fish they contained. Mr. F. B. Stead, the naturalist in charge of these investigations, has conducted trawling experiments in these localities during the months of October to December, and the most important facts ascertained by him are as follows: Of the different species of fish captured in the bays, plaice and dabs are by far the most numerous; and as of these two species the plaice is, from the economic point of view, far the most important, the large number of competing dabs must probably be regarded as a positive hindrance to the well-being of the plaice, so that any controversy that may be raised as to the advisability of maintaining the by-law now in force should be solely occupied with the consideration of the question whether the closure of the bays to trawlers is necessary or desirable for the protection of the plaice. It has further been shown that the bays differ markedly from one another in respect of the sizes of the fish they contain. Thus, while half the plaice in Start Bay were found to be over 12½ in. in length in Teignmouth Bay half the plaice captured were under 10½ in. A similar difference held in the case of the dabs. A preliminary account of these investigations will appear in the ensuing number of the Journal of the association.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

MANCHESTER GOWTHE SOCIETY.—(Owens College, Annual Meeting, Wednesday, January 22.)

THE Rev. F. F. CORNISH, president, in the chair.—The President read a paper on "The Dedication and Prologue in the Theatre in 'Faust.'" The lecturer, after reminding his audience that the Dedication, the Prelude on the Stage, and the Prologue in Heaven were added when the First Part of "Faust" in its present form was published in 1797, maintained that these were necessary to prepare the way for the strange world into which Faust's soliloquy plunged the spectator. This was accomplished—first, by the antique cast of the Prelude, with its rude stage and other equipments, and the implied extempore character of the proposed performance, something after the fashion of the Venetian stage; and, secondly, by the bold stroke of the Prologue in Heaven, which carried us at once back through the medieval mystery play to the early Eastern dramatic form of the Book of Job. Paraphrasing the Dedication and the Prelude in the Theatre, the lecturer examined them critically with reference to their origin and subject-matter. As regards the origin of the Prelude in the Theatre, Schröder had drawn attention to the fact that in 1791 Goethe read J. G. Foster's translation of Kalidasa's "Sakuntala," and expressed the highest admiration for it. This play begins with a dialogue between the theatre director and an actress. Victor Hehn had rightly cautioned us against supposing that the poet is the defender of the true view of which the Lustige Person and the Stage Manager support only the perversions. When Goethe took up his fragment with a view to completing it in dramatic form, the whole relations between poetry and life, the theatre and the world, the actor and spectator, unfolded themselves to his view. The stage of which the Director, the Poet, and the Lustige Person are brought before us is an ideal stage. The implied extemporised character of the play points to the half extemporised pieces which distinguished the German stage of the last century, referred to in the thirteenth book of Dichtung und Wahrheit, and reminds us of Goethe's own account of a play which he witnessed at Venice. The poet is made to speak with the practical inexperience of youth, yet each one of the poet's aspirations is real, and founded in Goethe's own experience. The Director's picture of the crowds thronging to the theatre fills the poet with horror, just as in Dichtung und Wahrheit Goethe speaks of the popularity which followed the publication of "Götz," and how he was drawn forth from the quiet and obscurity which can alone favour pure creation. So, too, Wilhelm Meister says that the poet must live wholly in the objects which delight him. The Poet in the Prelude, rejecting with disgust the Director's recipe for the production of a popular piece, recalls Wilhelm Meister's exalted conception of the function of a poet. The Lustige Person urges that it is the young, whose minds are growing, who must be catered for. In Dichtung und Wahrheit Goethe says that it was the subject of "Götz," not the treatment of it, which gained the sympathy of young men for the play. Goethe once explained to Eckermann on similar grounds the preference which students showed for Schiller's "Robbers" or "Fiesco" rather than for Schiller's more matured creations. Passing from the Poet to the other interlocutors, the lecturer, after drawing attention to a passage in Dichtung und Wahrheit bearing on the introduction of the Lustige Person, said that in the Prelude the latter champions what Victor Hehn calls "poetical realism," urging that the poet should aim at pleasing the young by striking boldly into the stream of life as we all live it: to do this the poet need not be young, he has only to strike the familiar lyre with spirit and grace, to sweep along with sweet digression towards a self-appointed aim. In February, 1829, Goethe remarked to Eckermann that his "Iphigenia" and his "Tasso" succeeded, because he was young enough to be able to penetrate and enliven with his sensuousness the ideal matter of the plays. The whole passage illustrates Goethe's satire upon the view taken by the Lustige Person. The Director is the guardian of the fund out of which the expenses are to be paid. Goethe takes the opportunity here of giving many a shrewd hit at the German audience of his day. As it is put in Wilhelm Meister, the rude man is contented if he sees but something going on. The confused judgment which marked a German audience is commented on by Goethe in a conversation with Eckermann in 1824. The Manager's idea is to overwhelm the audience with quantity, to distract them, but his main aim is to make the thing pay. This material point of view is not without its higher side, as Goethe insisted one day to Eckermann. "The prohibition of 'Tartuffe,'" said Goethe, "was a thunderclap to Molière—but not so much for Molière the poet as for Molière the director." In art as in morals there are paradoxes. "Scott said he did not care a curse about what he wrote [writes Edward Fitzgerald to Fanny Kemble], and I don't believe it was far otherwise with Shakespeare."—An interesting discussion followed the paper.

FOLK-LORE SOCIETY.—(Annual Meeting, Wednesday, January 22.)

EDWARD CLODD, Esq., president, in the chair.—The report of the council referred to the progress of the collection of county folk-lore and of a bibliography of all the British literature on the subject; as also to the loss which the science has sustained by the deaths of Prof. George Stephens, Dr. Robert Brown, M.M. Ploix, Luzal, Dragomann, and Prof. Fleury.—In the address which followed, the president, after a brief survey of the work of the year, and reference to the less direct but potent influence of the society in the collection and study of folk-lore in manifold directions, as also in the issue of works of the high stamp of Miss Roalfe Cox's Introduction to Folk-lore, Mrs. Gomme's Dictionary of British Games, Mr. Nutt's Voyage of Bran, and Mr. Jacobs's Barlaam and Josephat, made allusion to the justification of his remarks on the methods of the psychical researchers, as opposed to those of the folk-lorists, in his former address. The detection of the woman Eusebia Paladino, for whom such remarkable claims had been made, and who had found a quasi-defender in Mr. Andrew Lang, had seriously weakened the force of Mr. Lang's reply to Mr. Clodd's strictures. Desiring that the main theme of the address should be supplemental to that of the former address, namely, the contention that folk-lore—which was then defined as the psychical side of anthropology—brings its support to the theory of man's evolution, Mr. Clodd applied this somewhat in detail. Criticising the hesitating attitude of most folk-lorists in face of the great significance of the materials in hand, he brought home his meaning by showing the real drift of such books as Mr. Fraser's Golden Bough and Mr. Hartland's Legend of Perseus. The central idea of Mr. Fraser's book is the "conception of the slain god." He becomes incarnate in man, animal, or plant, and is slain: both the incarnation and the death being for the benefit of mankind. Moreover, he is eaten, in the barbaric belief that his attributes and powers are thus absorbed; for "by eating the bread and drinking the wine the worshipper partakes of the real body and blood of his god." So the act becomes a solemn sacrament. Mr. Clodd then cited the Catholic doctrine of Transubstantiation, and the Protestant doctrine of the Eucharist, to show that these are the lineal descendants of the barbaric idea of eating the god, whereby the communicant becomes a "partaker of the Divine nature." The central idea of Mr. Hartland's book is complementary to that of the Golden Bough in its collection of barbaric legends of miraculous conceptions and virgin births; and Mr. Clodd sought to show that there is no discontinuity between these legends and the fundamental idea at the core of them, and those which took shape in the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation and other outcomes of the belief in superhuman personages born of virgin mothers. The persistence of barbaric ideas and their outward expression throughout the higher culture, the fact that all changes in popular belief have been superficial, was then illustrated by four examples drawn from current practices—namely, Exorcism, Baptism, Orientalism, and Divine Judgments. In the Services of Holy Week from the revised Sarum Missal the "priests" are directed to exorcise the devil from flowers. The utterance of the Bishop of Cashel, that "baptism conveys spiritual grace," was shown to be the lineal descendant of the barbaric animism which accredited everything with life, baptism itself being the old pagan lustration. The burial of the late Bishop of Winchester with his feet to the East was shown to be connected with the widespread barbaric rite of orientalism. And the circular of a reverend politician, in which the judgment of God was declared to have been manifest in the attack of influenza which Lord Rosebery suffered on the day before he introduced the Welsh Disestablishment Bill, was equated with the omens and portents which are the apparatus of the "medicine man." Mr. Clodd then cited passages from the works of Burton, Hobbes, and Conyers Middleton, in which the continuity between past and present was illustrated, and ended by summarising a large number of rites and customs traceable to pagan and barbaric sources. The conclusion deduced therefrom supports the theory of man's psychical unity, and the demand for the inclusion of all belief and ritual as within the special province of folk-lore for investigation.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.—(Monday, January 27.)

PROF. LIVING, vice-president, in the chair.—Prof. J. J. Thomson, president, read a paper on "Longitudinal Vibrations in connexion with Recent Photographic Discoveries." This paper discusses the theory of longitudinal waves from the point of view of the electro-magnetic theory of light, and shows that on that theory longitudinal waves can exist (1) in a medium containing moving charged ions, (2) in any medium, provided the wave length is so small as to be comparable with molecular dimensions, and the ether in the medium is in motion. It is shown that it follows from the equations of the electro-magnetic field, that the ether is set in motion in a varying electric field. These short waves would not be refracted; but in this respect they do not differ from transverse waves, which on the electro-magnetic theory would not be refracted, if the wave length were comparable with molecular distances. The properties of the longitudinal waves are developed in the paper. The author exhibited a number of photographs which had been taken at the Cavendish Laboratory by Prof. Röntgen's method, and experiments made on the Röntgen rays were described. In one of these experiments the photographic plate was placed inside the vacuum tube, so as to intercept the rays between the cathode and the walls of the tube; in this case the plate was not affected, showing that the fluorescence of the glass is necessary for the production of these rays. Other experiments were made to see if they could be excited by fluorescence without a cathode; the ring discharge was produced in bulbs and caused a vivid phosphorescence; a plate protected by cardboard when exposed to the bulb for an hour was not affected, nor was any greater effect produced when the bulb was filled with a gas such as oxygen which phosphoresces under the discharge. It thus appears that both a cathode and a phosphorescent substance are required for the production of these rays, and that one without the other is inoperative. A series of experiments were made by taking photographs through tourmaline plates, (1) with their axes parallel, (2) with their axes crossed: it was hoped by this method to get some evidence as to whether the rays were longitudinal or transverse. A considerable number of photographs were taken in this way, but no difference could be detected in the obstruction offered to the rays by the tourmaline plates in the two cases. Another method of investigating the same question was described, based on Elster and Geitel's discovery of the influence of the plane of polarisation of light on its power to discharge electricity from a metallic surface. The experiments, which were not concluded until the day after the meeting of the society, show that these rays exert the most powerful effect in discharging electricity, whether positive or negative, from an insulated electrified metal plate exposed to their influence. A bulb separated from the charged plate by a board  $\frac{1}{2}$  of an inch thick covered with several layers of tinfoil exerted a most powerful effect, and it was not until the thickness of the metal between the bulb and the electrified plate was nearly  $\frac{1}{2}$  of an inch that the effect ceased to be perceptible. The electrified plate is a much more delicate detector of these rays than the photographic one, and is more suitable when measurements are required. These results, though by no means conclusive, are in favour of the vibrations being longitudinal.

FINE ART.

OLD MASTERS AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

III.

WHEN Decamps was at the height of his reputation, he was, above all things, renowned as a painter of light. Now, looking at his splendid pages of Eastern life, as he saw it before the glamour and the strangeness had for ever been rubbed away; comparing them with the works of those who were more truly luminaristes, we seem to see rather the patterns and colours of light, than light itself. "L'Abreuvoir" is, nevertheless, a superb example of his power and of his convinced attitude as an orientalist, Another painter of the same group, who, until his promising career came to an untimely end, in 1847, was by many looked upon as Decamps' rival, was Prosper Marilhat. His "Banks of the Nile" is neat and hard, what we should call "tea-boardy," yet not devoid of charm in its peculiar and now démodé style.

In the battle of the nations and styles at the Old Masters' this winter, it is certainly Meissonnier who comes off worst. Of the "Polichinelle" we prefer to say nothing; but the "Bravi" and the "Amateurs d'Estampes" are admirable examples of his middle period: marvels of patient study, of mingled breadth and finish—worthy, indeed, in these respects, to compare with the productions of any among the great Dutchmen who as a rule hang on these very walls. Technically Meissonnier's greatest faults are his lack of suppleness in design, and his hotness of colour, still further aggravated by the unpleasant tone of his shadows. And how little do his frigid conceptions go to the root of things; how entirely, even apart from mere subject, do they belong to the realms of drama and comedy! His exact position in art it is not easy to define. With all the wondrous accomplishment of its kind shown in the works of the class to which these panels belong—the works at which the larger public still gaze in open-mouthed astonishment—it is by no means clear that the world would be much the poorer were they to be altogether subtracted from the sum of the century's achievement in painting.

The best of Jean-François Millet's pictures at the Academy is the well-known "Wood-Sawyers." It is not a subject giving full scope for the expression of his large and noble conception of rustic life, yet it affords proof of his rare power to ennoble a simple motive, without false idealisation, by neglecting its merely accidental surroundings and selecting with an unerring instinct its essential elements of character and expression. No Greek group or frieze could well be finer in rhythmic movement than this simple design of coarse, massive French peasants at work sawing and chopping tree-trunks. And the main difference between Millet and our Frederick Walker is: that the latter will be a Greek at whatever cost, that he forces his labourers quand même to assume the god, while Millet, by the more natural method of generalisation and suppression of what is not absolutely vital from his point of view, shows the god even through the meanest rustic. To see the Barbizon masters in a large and representative series one must go to the Grafton Gallery, where the great collection of Mr. J. S. Forbes, less these examples contributed to the exhibition of the Royal Academy, is now to be found. Though the little canvas "Rome"—with its foreground of dark Pincian Hill and beyond it the dome of St. Peter's, opaline in the evening light—is an early example, still hard and angular, it is nevertheless full of the peculiar beauty inherent in so august a scene, yet so seldom worthily expressed. Still finer is the "Avignon," with the Rhone twisting through the canvas like a blue ribbon, and the great Castle of the Popes making, as it were, the backbone of the design. The later Corot—the one we know best—is shown in two examples, "Evening" and "Landscape—Ville d'Avray," both of good quality, yet neither of any great distinctiveness. The "Evening" strikes the beholder as echoing a little too closely other and more spontaneous idylls from the same brush.

Seldom has such an opportunity been given as the Academy now furnishes for comparing the Barbizon group of painters with the master whom France now formally recognises as their pioneer in landscape—we mean, of course, Constable. To him we shall refer presently in dealing with the English pictures. His splendid painted prose, vibrating as it does with the life which is everywhere in nature, is in some important respects superior to the work of any of his French followers. Where they excel is in giving a more personal, a more moving interpretation of the everyday nature in which they, like their English predecessor, delight. Take, for instance, Théodore Rousseau's "The Arched Bridge" here. The sombre scene, with a sky the blue of which is almost veiled by threatening cloud, is only the valley of the Seine seen from the terrace of St. Cloud, and there has been no attempt to lend to it any other than its own character. Yet, with how rare an intuition Rousseau brings us into sympathy with this mood of nature, or rather excites in us the mood with which such a scene is most naturally in consonance. The beautiful sunset motive, "The Fisherman," by Diaz, would in itself prove his relationship to Rousseau, whom he sometimes equals or excels in pictorial charm of the more obvious order, though the inspiration does not come so fresh from the fountain-head. In those great pages of nature in which Troyon sums himself up—such as the "Boeufs se rendant au labour," of the Louvre, and the "Vallée de la Touque"—he is at least the equal of any of his great contemporaries. Elsewhere he sometimes falls below their highest level, less as a craftsman than as an artist. The picture strangely catalogued as "Le Troupeau ramenant" is for him unusually lyrical in mood: beautiful as it is, the little canvas is not one from which, by itself, one would learn much as to the artist. Daubigny's magnificent "Moonlight" was at the Royal Academy in 1866, and was then treated with scant courtesy. There is an indescribable, an almost tragic beauty in the simple scene—a poem of the sky, in which the earth plays an important, yet subsidiary, part. Only dimly lighted by a moon whose radiance the fleecy clouds everywhere clothing the sky seem to absorb, the fields, the humble cottage of the peasant folk who are seen hastening home, carrying the new-born lambs, gain a mysterious beauty, and lose nothing of simple truth. With the canvas of Bastien-Lepage, absurdly misnamed here "Marie Bashkirtseff," we come down as late as 1882—that is, within two years of the young master's death. The young Russian lady, whose personality has overmuch occupied the English public of late years, was, at the date of this picture, at least twenty years of age; and her half modish, half Bohemian, and wholly northern appearance had nothing in common with that of the simple child of eight or nine whose face here peeps forth from a dainty hood of grey and rose. Hardly anywhere has Bastien-Lepage handled the brush better than here: the atmospheric environment of the figure, presented as usual in an even grey daylight, is given in perfection, and the whole thing has a homogeneity, both of subject and technique, which the work of this lamented painter too often lacks.

The English masters of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries hold their own bravely, and serve once more to show the singular independence from contemporary foreign influence of our school until quite recent times. It was the Netherlands, Dutch and Flemish, of the seventeenth century, and the Italians of the mature and declining Renaissance, whom we followed, or rather under whose guidance we freely developed ourselves. The influence of France in the eighteenth century, except in decoration and the smaller arts, amounted to little or nothing.

was. He here exaggerates his master's chief fault, the lack of the power to bind together in a moderately convincing fashion a number of figures comprised in the same portrait-group. As usual, Sir Joshua Reynolds is represented by a series of canvases—some superlatively good, some uninteresting and second-rate. Within the last category comes certainly the weak, faded "Portrait of a Lady" (Mr. Greville Douglas)—to our thinking by no means a convincing Reynolds, and certainly an indifferent picture. The "Portrait of Lady Sondes," though it may not captivate the lovers of Sir Joshua's suavity and mundane elegance, is in many respects one of his most magnificent pieces of execution. Not particularly well placed on the canvas, the youthful figure, crowned with a huge black, be-ribboned hat, has less of the usual self-conscious fascination than of that wonderful directness and vitality which one looks for rather in the works of a Velazquez, a Frans Hals, or a Gainsborough. Those two exquisite inventions, "Mercury as a Outpurse" and "Cupid as a Linkboy," can at this stage of their destinies be enjoyed only as designs. A too drastic restoration or renovation has rendered it difficult indeed to recognise, in the smooth, dull surfaces, the master's own handling. It is in such things as these that he is incomparable, and carries away the palm from his great rival Gainsborough. Reynolds is an inventor: whether in portrait or fanciful study, he puts his subject before the spectator in such a personal, novel fashion that it leaves its imprint for ever on the brain. Perhaps as a painter he was never quite so brilliant or so overflowing with vitality as Gainsborough is, for instance, in the "Blue Boy" here, or in other exceptional masterpieces that could be named. The majestic "Mrs. Siddons as the Tragic Muse," occupying a post of honour in the Great Gallery, exercises its wonted spell, and shows Sir Joshua for once wholly successful in that idealistic style in which he counts few completely satisfactory achievements. The "Blue Boy" invites discussion as little as does the last-mentioned great canvas—its neighbour here, as it is in the gallery of the Duke of Westminster. Van Dyck, who is avowedly the model, has perhaps attacked the special pictorial problem—that of treating large masses of shimmering blue in a full light—with more frankness and brilliancy, if with less cunning in evasion, than his English descendant; and he has certainly invested his portraits of aristocratic youths with a supreme distinction which Gainsborough, with all his fashionable aplomb, cannot match. To this his champions would, no doubt, reply that Master Buttall, though a handsome, bright-eyed young fellow, is not Lord Bernard Stuart or the young Duke of Buckingham. Where Gainsborough triumphs is in the supreme vigour and skill with which he places his young model on his legs in the foreground of the lurid landscape; in the life which, like a very Prometheus, he breathes into him. The "Portrait of Thomas Hibbert, Esq., of Chalfont," is one of not a few Gainsboroughs which go to prove that in treating the uncompromising scarlet of a cloth coat he was generally less than happy; the face, though its tones are forced to suit the hot scheme of colour, is capital and modelled with unusual care. An agreeable half-length of rather superficial and conventional character is the over-cleaned "Portrait of Lady le Despencer." More decorative, more personal, yet also a little superficial in the swiftness of its execution, is the brilliant "Portrait of Lady Margaret Fordyce."

Gainsborough's mood is as different in landscape, as far from being the buoyant one which is natural to him in giving his interpretation of a human individuality, as his schemes of colour in this branch of his art are, in the majority of cases, different from those in which his greatest masterpieces of portraiture are conceived. In landscape we generally have the sunset radiance permeating half-transparent spaces of gloom, and with it the reflective mood, melancholy, yet not to the point of sadness. Of three canvases exhibited in the Great Gallery, No. III., the "Landscape with Cattle and Figures," is the finest. It is a decorative harmony on a motive taken from nature, rather than a true representation of nature as Constable would have understood it; yet it has a rare beauty and unity of its own. In "The Harvest Waggon" one is struck by the happy treatment, if not precisely by the accurate drawing, of the figures, the horses, and the waggon. Altogether inferior, and indeed a very puzzling piece, is "The Girl at the Stile."

Romney, among some things of important dimensions which are perfunctory and tiresome, has a charming, slight half-length, "Mrs. Glyn," done with just that vivacity and truth which the painter sometimes crushed out when he finished. A solid piece of portraiture, too, with a more self-assertive individuality than Romney generally allows to his beauties, is the "Lady Eliot, afterwards Countess of St. Germans." It is unfortunately marred by the excruciatingly unpleasant quality of the colour in the lady's draperies—a wan pink and an acid, yellowish green.

Turner is here in well-nigh all his styles, and will no doubt by his out-and-out admirers be equally accepted in all the canvases for which he is responsible, though their merit is very unequal. Stately and pathetic in its austerity, profoundly rooted in truth, is the "Conway Castle," which may be taken to represent the climax of the first manner, though there is to be noted in its design a certain want of unity, a certain superfluity of motive and fact incompletely harmonised. The much-injured "Rome from Mount Aventine," first exhibited in 1836, is an example of Turner at his worst, one of those landscapes in which he parts company with Nature, and gives us—as he does only when his flight droops and his inspiration is dried up at the source—something falsely romantic in its stead. Much better, and better preserved, is the companion piece, "Modern Rome, Campo Vaccino." The fair, twilight vision of the Eternal City is here, at any rate, founded on a study of nature poetised in a more legitimate fashion. True romance, akin in quality to that of a Spenser or a Keats, is the essence of the beautiful "Pluto and Proserpine," first seen in 1839. Here the painter so carries us with him that we do not stop to dissect his beautiful dream-world, where shadowy, rainbow-hued forms move, where rills flow from the heights, where the gold of sunset yellows the tree-tops, and makes fair the valleys of the mysterious land. Latest of all is the astonishing "Blue Lights to warn Steamboats off Shoal Water," exhibited in 1840. Notwithstanding the formal realism of the title, the picture is one of those dazzling fantasies in which none but a Turner would have dared to indulge; and, being in unusually good preservation, it may count as a typical example of its class. Dissect the work as mere representation, as mere reflection of the thing seen, and you leave little or nothing behind. Take it as the poignant expression of what the far-reaching vision of the painter and the poet divined in such a subject—as a suggestion of what it called up in his troubled soul—and it is incomparable. It is here that Turner differs absolutely from a brilliant Impressionist of to-day, such as Claude Monet, whose work is only valuable as reflecting with an impersonal truth of representation not hitherto attained certain beautiful, ephemeral aspects of the outer world.

By Constable we have a "Landscape," with Dedham Church in the distance, calling up memories of the more famous "Dedham Vale," about which there have been lately so many heartburnings. Then the famous "Dedham Lock, or the Leaping Horse," an intensely vigorous work of the later time, with all the exaggerations of illumination and technique belonging to that period. Much more legitimate in style, and nearly resembling, in its relatively even method of execution, the famous "Hay Wain" which revolutionised the art-world of France in 1824, is "Stratford Mill, on the Stour, near Bergholt," painted in 1820. In many parts of this landscape there is an incomparable freshness and beauty. Who ever painted better, or indeed so well, the sheen of a pure, quiet pool or the glancing of the silver stream as it quietly winds through its low grassy banks? And yet the scene—of no very striking beauty in itself—is reproduced to perfection, rather than grasped as a whole, and then given forth, a new thing, with the impress of the painter's own individuality once for all stamped upon it.

Few pictures in the exhibition are more beautiful than John Sell Cotman's "A Calm," a simple study of the seashore, with three barges motionless on the calm, grey-green expanse. A transparent haze is between water and sky, making them seemingly one; the seagulls flying low, and marvellously well-placed in the foreground of the picture, constitute the only element of life in it. Not less beautiful is the "Seashore" of Bonington, with its rain-washed evening sky expanding dome-like and vast in its pure, pale radiance. He has noted with singular truth the effect, on figures and objects in the foreground, of the sun's last rays, alighting almost horizontally ere they altogether vanish.

THOUGHTS FOR ST. PAUL'S.

Nottingham: Feb. 1, 1896.

Lord Leighton will be fitly interred in St. Paul's, and doubtless some adequate memorial of him will be placed there. It is to be hoped that this will form a part of the general scheme of decoration, and that it may, if possible, incorporate his own noble design, "And the Sea gave up the Dead which were in it."

A greater designer than Leighton, though not a greater artist, William Blake, supreme in the supreme gift of imagination, lies buried in an unknown grave and without a public memorial. The two men offer in many respects a striking contrast, yet both must be reckoned among the disciples of Michelangelo, and the work of both at its best has something of that architectonic character so often lacking in modern art, so essential to the decoration of a great building. Dr. Garnett has lately suggested that there could be no better monument to Blake "than his own 'Death's Door' . . . treated as a bas-relief, with the necessary modifications." James Smetham (Essay in Gilchrist's Life, 2nd ed., ii. 350) dreamed of a building, which one might perhaps compare to the Arena Chapel at Padua, wholly consecrated to Blake's memory, and to his greatest work, the sublime Job. But in this connexion I prefer to recall the conversation of Samuel Palmer with Blake himself (ibid. i. 346):

"He loved to speak of the years spent by Michael Angelo, without earthly reward, and solely for the love of God, in the building of St. Peter's, and of the wondrous architects of our cathedrals. In Westminster Abbey were his earliest and most sacred recollections. I asked him how he would like to paint on glass, for the great west window, his 'Sons of God Shouting for Joy,' from his designs in the Job. He said, after a pause, 'I could do it!' kindling at the thought."

Westminster, I fear, does not afford a field suited to the execution of such a project; and, though Blake truly owed much to the Gothic spirit, he owed no less to the painter of the Sistine, whose example he treasured. What is needed, in justice to the artist's memory, is that some of his best work should be reproduced in a permanent form in some not unworthy building, and on a scale appropriate to the grandeur of his colossal design. And it seems reasonable to suggest that for this purpose an opportunity might be found in connexion with the work of decoration now in progress at St. Paul's, a work which must some day proceed from the choir to the transept, and perhaps even to the dome.

When that day, which may be yet far distant, is reached, I hope the artist will avoid the error of breaking up the surface of the cupola by conventional architecture or geometrical lines. The proper effect of such a surface depends upon its unity, continuity, and infinite gradation; and, if I may use the expression, upon its universality of direction and extent, facing us along all radii, and turning every way, like the visible sky. And this effect must be in great measure lost or spoiled, if the surface is broken up into definite areas or panels. Rather, I think, at the first springing of the vault should appear Water, whether that of Death or of Life. Beyond and above this the Celestial Country, peopled by that great multitude which no man could number (Rev. vii. 9), wherein Humanity should be represented by her noblest names.

"Per sacra lilia, perque virentia germina florum, Expatlabitur, ac modulabitur ordo plorum."

Higher yet, as in mid-air,

"Angels ascending and descending, bands
Of guardians bright."

While a radiance as of the Divine Glory should proceed from the central opening, and the vault of the lantern should bear, as at Ely, an image or symbol of the Divine Presence.

"All that is manifest Is but a token,"

but it is the function of Art to supply that token,

"And what in wavering apparition gleams Fix in its place with thoughts that stand for ever."

In conclusion, I trust it will be understood that these suggestions are put forward with entire deference to the judgment of Mr. Richmond.

THE BEWCASTLE COLUMN.

Marburg: Jan. 31, 1896.

As my monograph on the Northumbrian runic stones (Marburg: Elwert) may not reach all that are interested in the subject, I am anxious to repeat here a wish expressed in the concluding remarks (op. cit., p. 46f.); namely, that the Bewcastle column (circa 670) should without delay be made accessible in plaster-casts (and photographs taken from them) in one or several of the science and art museums. This is almost more important than the preservation of the original, which, especially the principal inscription on the west side, is, however, in its present situation in Bewcastle churchyard, pitifully exposed to the ravages of time, and appears to have notably suffered even since the days of Maughan and Haigh.

WILHELM VICTOR.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE next few days may be somewhat eventful ones in the history of the Royal Academy of Arts. The place of "Frederic, first Lord Leighton of Stretton," as its president, has to be filled—at all events temporarily; and at least two Associates—one of whom is practically bound to be an essentially English landscape painter, imbued with the great traditions—will be added to the lower grade of the Academic body. For the presidency—at all events for the time—Sir John Millais has, it is reported on quite the best authority, been all but secured; but were Sir John at the last moment to decline acceptance of the post, even for a season, the place would fall probably either to Mr. Val Prinsep or to Mr. W. Q. Orchardson, in one or other of whose hands it is likely to rest eventually. While these distinguished names by no means exhaust the list of possible presidents who would be received with cordiality on the part of the public, it is probable that we have mentioned all who might hope at present to secure anything like the practical unanimity of their brethren. The Academy is bound to have a considerable painter at its head, but it is not bound at all to have such a painter as is a man of genius; for as time goes on, not only the ceremonial functions, but the business organisation and the conduct of the affairs of the body in view of the world, tend to increase in importance, and it is essential that the Academy shall be represented in its counsels with keen and proved ability in affairs, and in society with splendour and presence. Nor will it be the slightest disadvantage if the precise aims in painting of its new chief should differ even widely from those of its late illustrious head; for it is undesirable that the Academy should give colourable excuse for the assertion that it lacks width of sympathy, and that in its view "High Art" is confined to a particular groove.

THE March number of the Magazine of Art will be enlarged, in order to include a record of the works of the late Lord Leighton. A number of representative pictures and drawings will be reproduced, in addition to several portraits, while a photograph of "Perseus and Andromeda" will form the frontispiece.

THE exhibitions to open next week include: water-colours by members of the Dudley Gallery Art Society, at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly; and a collection of pictures by the leading artists of Holland, at the Continental Gallery, New Bond-street.

AT the meeting of the Anthropological Institute on Tuesday next, Mr. B. M. B. Swan, Mr. Bent's companion on his archaeological expedition to South Africa, will read a paper on "Zimbabwe."

WE have received a reprint from the American Journal of Archaeology of one of the papers of the American School at Athens, describing the excavations of the theatre at Eretria in 1894, by Mr. Edward Capps. Apart from technical details, the chief interest lies in the explanation given of the large, carefully built tunnel or vaulted passage under the scena. Mr. Fossum, in the first report on these excavations, regarded this tunnel as the means of communication for the chorus between the upper and lower levels. In reply to objections from Mr. Ernest Gardner and others, Mr. Capps now suggests that it may have been used for the processions of priests, public officials, &c., who entered the theatre at festivals after the sacrifice at the altar. The ordinary entrance of the chorus, as of the actors, he thinks must have been through doors in the parodoi, some of which can still be traced. He further maintains that the existence of this tunnel—which is much better preserved than the similar ones at Sicyon, Magnesia, and Tralles—supplies the strongest evidence in favour of Dr. Dörpfeld's theory of the Greek stage; for it shows that actors appeared in the orchestra at Eretria at a period possibly not far removed from the age of Vitruvius, at a time when a Vitruvian proscenium, whether of wood or of stone, was standing.

THE STAGE.

STAGE NOTES.

FEW things are more noticeable on our contemporary stage—especially in view of the extraordinarily perverted taste of the greater portion of the public in narrative fiction—than the continued and long success of anything so simple as "The Professor's Love Story." It is even now drawing good houses at the Garrick, and is played still with a freshness as well as a finish which is entirely remarkable. Criticism of the piece itself would doubtless be accounted belated at the present time; but it is impossible to resist the remark that the piece is healthy and charming and dexterous as a whole, albeit not altogether free from conventional stage devices, like the finding of the letter to Miss Goodwillie in the old letter-box twenty years after date—a dodge resorted to by the dramatist simply because it is necessary, at a certain point, to cause a sudden revulsion of feeling in the breast of the worthy lady, and this is the readiest, though also the cheapest, means to effect it. The piece, again, is beaten out remarkably thin—in the sense, we mean, that while there is very little incident there is likewise but little development or subtlety in the study of character. The actor does nearly everything; but the dramatist, to do him justice, has given the actor a good framework; and though several of the devices the popular Mr. Barrie employs are not such as would be considered for a moment as legitimate by any serious and penetrating artist in narrative fiction, they are sanctioned on the stage, where the popular playwright's art scarcely ever probes to the depths of things. The piece, in any case, is a wonderful relief after the tiresome presentation, right and left, of the woman not only with a past, but an infinite past. It is bright, optimistic, agreeable, and we welcome it. Though from end to end passion, in which Mr. Willard is so strong, is never even approached, so various and so rich are the resources of the actor in fanciful and sympathetic comedy, that the part of the professor so tardily and strangely suffering love remains one of his best. We shall not be sorry, however, when Mr. Willard again presents himself in a rôle which permits the exhibition of feeling profounder and more vehement. In "The Professor's Love Story" no other man's part is of any real importance. Miss Nanny Craddock is delicate and not ineffective as the young Dowager Lady Gilding; but greater individuality is displayed by Miss Annie Hughes, whose manner is at once simple and pleasantly acidulated, and whose art within its obvious limitations is so neat and so complete. Nor again can individuality be said to be lacking in the slightest degree to a young actress whom we see for the first time—Miss Keith Wakeman—who plays with admirable freedom and vigour. There are one or two scenes—that in the harvest field especially—which forced on us the question: Have we not here the actress who, more almost than anybody else, could look, and be, Tess of the D'Urbervilles? It is quite possible, of course, that she might somewhere fail, but we are certain that she would somewhere succeed.

At the London Institution, on Thursday next, Dr. H. Frank Heath, of University College, will give a lecture on "The Stage, from Shakspeare to Irving."

MUSIC.

MR. MARK HAMBOURG gave a second piano-forte recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday, when he more than confirmed the good impression made at the first. His performance of Schumann's "Fantasia" (Op. 17) was remarkable. As a mere technical display, it was extremely brilliant; the second movement, over the difficulties of which so many pianists have stumbled, was rendered with energy, and with only one or two unimportant slips. We name the technical side first, though it is not the most important. With well-disposed fingers and hard practice, mastery of the keyboard can be acquired; of this the number of skilful pianists now before the public gives proof. Mr. Hambourg has, in addition, a true artistic nature. In his playing of the Schumann piece he brought his audience directly in communication with the composer; from the notes he evolved the living spirit of the music. In other pieces the same was felt, though not perhaps to the same extent. It is this feature of Mr. Hambourg's playing that specially commends itself to us, and if, as seems likely, he aims at interesting, not merely astonishing, his audience, his quickly acquired fame will increase and endure. He commenced his first concert with an arrangement of one of Bach's organ Fugues. We were glad, therefore, to find the master properly represented this time by a genuine clavier piece, and one of his greatest—the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue. Of late, transcriptions of Bach and other masters have been far too much in vogue. Mr. Hambourg, it should be stated, is still several years under twenty, and only this week he was naturalised as an Englishman.

A JUBILEE performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" is to be given in the summer at the Crystal Palace. This oratorio, during its long career, has met with no dangerous rival, and its hold, therefore, on the public is still as great as ever. "Elijah" may not be an ideal oratorio, but it is certainly the greatest work of its kind since Handel. Therefore the fiftieth anniversary of its production at Birmingham deserves special commemoration.

MR. DAVID BISPHAM's third concert of modern music of various schools will be given on Tuesday afternoon at St. James's Hall, under the patronage of Princess Christian. The programme includes solos by Miss Fanny Davies at the piano, and by Signor Piatti on the violoncello; and also two recitations by Mr. Hermann Vezin.

CLARENDON PRESS LIST.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, 25s.

Edited by the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE.

THE WORKS OF JOSEPH BUTLER, D.C.L.

(SOMETIME LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM).

Divided into Sections. With Sectional Headings; an Index to each Volume; also Prefatory Matter.

Vol. I.—ANALOGY, &amp;c. | Vol. II.—SERMONS, &amp;c.

"Mr. Gladstone has earned the gratitude of English-speaking Christians. No praise, we are confident, could be less acceptable to Mr. Gladstone than to say that he has given us the 'final edition' of Butler's Works."—Guardian.

"Mr. Gladstone has produced what may well be regarded for many years to come as the classical edition of Butler."—Times.

"The two handsome volumes of Mr. Gladstone's 'Butler' are a monument of patient scholarship, and will be generally recognised as the most useful edition of the great divine which has ever appeared."—Manchester Guardian.

"The merits of Mr. Gladstone's edition are many, and considerable in value. By breaking up the 'Analogy' into small sections with appropriate headings, he has done a double service for students. These small intellectual crumbs will be all the more digestible, and the line of argument indicated by the headings will become the clearer to the reader, and help him to a firmer and more systematic grasp of the subject."—Morning Post.

REVENUE LAWS of PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS.

Edited from a Greek Papyrus in the Bodleian Library, with a Translation, Commentary, and Appendices, by B. P. GREENFELL, M.A., and an Introduction by the Rev. J. F. MAHAFFY, D.D., Hon. D.C.L. With 13 Plates in a Portfolio.

Just published, Second Edition, Revised and Corrected, crown 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

NOTES on the TEXT of the BOOK of GENESIS.

With an Appendix by G. J. SPURGEON, M.A., formerly Hebrew Lecturer at Wadham College, Oxford; Examiner in the University of London—in Hebrew and New Testament Greek, 1888-98, in Semitic Languages, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1894, 1895; Assistant Master at the Merchant Taylors' School, London.

"In the present edition of the 'Notes on Genesis' a large amount of new matter has been incorporated. An introduction has been substituted for Appendix I., and the new edition has been enlarged by the addition of about forty new pages. Many of the notes have been recast and expanded; and many new notes have been added on different matters—generally points which were not commented on in the first edition, or were inadequately treated.

OPINIONS ON THE FIRST EDITION.

"Nothing similar exists in our language. The notes are excellent, and the scholarship shown in the volume both accurate and advanced. We commend this scholarly book to the perusal of all who seek after a critical acquaintance with the Hebrew text of Genesis."—Athenaeum.

"Careful use has been made of all the best critical materials, and the work has had the advantage of Professor Driver's supervision throughout. We can strongly recommend this scholarly volume."—Church Times.

A SHORT HISTORICAL LATIN GRAMMAR.

By W. M. LINDSAY, M.A., Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford.

"The book exhibits the historical development of the language in a manner that makes the study of the language a far more interesting business than the usual analytical and dogmatic grammars make of it. The book brings the rich material of its author's larger work within reach of young students, and would stimulate any intelligent lad's interest in Latin and in philology generally if used as a supplement to the ordinary grammars."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Lindsay's book is very well done; it is clear, interesting, and accurate. It is just the sort of book which a teacher might well have by him to consult, to borrow incidental explanations and illustrations from."—Guardian.

Mr. Elliott has been at much trouble to collect from all sources matter bearing on the subject, and he has shown great skill and ability in welding it into a united whole. ## FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

THE GUARDIAN.—"It is certainly a convenience to have the history of Dissent in England presented in a connected form, and from a Dissenter's point of view. And for these purposes we can recommend this, which gives the history in a handy and convenient form."

TIMES.—"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Readers will find here in a clear and attractive form much information which cannot readily be found anywhere else."

LITERATURE.

"HANDBOOKS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE." Edited by Prof. Hales. The Age of Dryden. By R. Garnett, C.B., LL.D. (Bell.)

It was undoubtedly a happy inspiration that led Prof. Hales to seek the good offices of Dr. Richard Garnett, of the British Museum, for the important bit of work so successfully achieved in these pages. True, it is rather as a typical man of letters on the grand scale, than as the minutely exact student of any one literary phase or period, that Dr. Garnett is widely and worthily known. To his contemporaries he is, before all else, a striking representative of that small but distinguished company of scholars who seem deliberately to take—not one, or half-a-dozen, or half-a-score, of the literatures of the world, much less one or other of the well-defined sections into which, for the most part, individual literatures naturally fall, but rather—universal literature, the whole vast field of human letters, for their special province and proper concern. And yet it is, perhaps, after all to this very circumstance—to the catholicity of his literary aims and studies—that Dr. Garnett may be said, in some measure, to owe his remarkable aptitude for such specially restricted tasks as that which he has here ably, and, indeed, brilliantly, discharged. For it is clear that, in order to construct a faithful survey of a given literary period, the critic must first possess the faculty of fixing the appropriate scale and magnitude of the whole work, as well as that of determining the relative prominence to be given to the various groups and individual figures composing it. In a word, the question of proportion is one which demands to be dealt with at the very outset of such an undertaking; and no matter how wide or how close his acquaintance with the writers to be surveyed, the critic, should he chance to fail here, must needs fail altogether. But, then, is it not precisely by means of studies similar to those for which, as we have seen, Dr. Garnett is chiefly celebrated—is it not by means of studies generously planned and fervidly prosecuted, ranging at large over many and diverse regions of literature—that there comes in the end to the critic this same indispensable faculty, the power of seeing authors and literary epochs in their true relative proportions?

Although, however, in the little book before us the fruits of this catholicity of view appear chiefly in the well-adjusted scale and accurate perspective of the composition, other more direct traces of its influence are by no means wanting. There is hardly a page upon which some apt allusion, some brilliant illustration, some pregnant contrast or comparison is not to be found, having casually escaped, so to speak, from the vast reminiscential treasures upgathered by Dr. Garnett in the course of his multifarious literary excursions. We say casually; for it is abundantly clear that these wayside gifts to the reader are a purely spontaneous product of an active brain, and flow as inevitably from Dr. Garnett's busy pen as the pearls and diamonds dropt from the magical comb of the fair Irish Princess. In spite of all this natural adornment, indeed, there is nothing more remarkable about Dr. Garnett's style than its perfect simplicity and directness. The prose of this little book is of the best; the sentences brief, terse, and perspicuous; the vocabulary—as one might expect to find it—of amplest range, yet always chosen with a view rather to force, precision, and clarity, than to the merely decorative qualities of picturesqueness or sonority. Occasionally Dr. Garnett's brevity becomes epigrammatic, as where he says of Etheredge's plays that "they all suffer from a deficiency of plot, a deficiency of wit, and a superfluity of naughtiness"; or where he tells us that under the Commonwealth Sir William Dugdale "made his living by the deaths of people of quality, whose funerals he conducted secundum artem"; or where, in the course of a grave discussion upon the moral character of Shadwell, he writes: "His friend, Dr. Nicholas Brady, vouches for the openness and friendliness of his temper; and further describes him as 'a complete gentleman.' But this was in a funeral sermon." Now and then—doubtless out of regard for the needs of us ordinary folk, who may say, each of his own memory, in the words of old Beattie of Meikledale, that "it only retains what hits our fancy"—Dr. Garnett adopts a humorous style of narrative, as in the following sentence (p. 118):

"The violent death of Archbishop Abbot's gamekeeper would have passed unnoticed if the poor man had been shot by anybody but the archbishop himself; and Elkanah Settle would have slipped away in the crowd of poetasters if Rochester had not taken it into his head to pit him against Dryden."

Similar plums are scattered with a wise parsimony throughout the volume, and will no doubt serve to tickle the coy appetites of the undergraduate and the army candidate. Thus, when commenting upon the curiously scanty production of the novel in the Restoration age, Dr. Garnett observes (p. 245):

"It seems difficult to offer any explanation, except that it had as yet occurred to none to depart from French models, and that the French exemplars of the day, like Samuel Weller, disclaimed all under the degree of 'a female markis.' Hence the healthy realism without which the English novel cannot prosper was impossible, and it was left to the Fieldings and Smolletts of the next age to effect a momentous revolution in art by the simple discovery that for the novelist's purpose, 'Jack was as good as his master.'"

Again, it is not likely that anyone, having once read it, should forget the following graphic account of Thomas Rymer the critic:

"He is a votary of decorum and dignity, and would no more than Voltaire have let a mouse into a tragedy. He discusses with imperturbable gravity, 'Who and who may kill one another with decency?' and decides, 'In poetry no woman is to kill a man, except her quality gives her the advantage above him. Poetical decency will not suffer death to be dealt to each other by such persons, whom the laws of duel allow not to enter the lists together.' And Rymer would have been content to have dwelt in such decencies for ever."

It is amusing, by the way, to note what an inexhaustible subject for solicitude "the decencies" afforded to the writers of this most indecent age. In a certain passage, not quoted by Dr. Garnett, of the History of his Own Times, for example, Bishop Burnet happens to mention the celebrated Nell Gwyn, who (he says), though she was a favourite, was never treated by Charles with the decencies of a mistress. "Quære," writes Dean Swift on the margin of his copy of the history: "What sort of decencies are these?"—a knotty point of manners which, since Thomas Rymer is no longer here to deal with it, may very well be suffered to remain unsolved.

Perhaps the best things in this book are the comparisons—an important element of Dr. Garnett's critical method. The device of bringing together two writers, widely separated perhaps by differences of age and country, for the purpose of comparing certain aspects of their moral or literary character, is obviously one which can be resorted to only by those who have read copiously in many literatures, and are moreover endowed with a tenacious and accurate memory. Here again, therefore, we find Dr. Garnett's encyclopaedic studies standing him in good stead. An instance or two of his skill in this direction may be given. On p. 39 he writes of Dryden:

"The resemblances and contrasts between him and Pope have been frequently discussed; there is another poet with whom comparison is less hackneyed and not unprofitable. In fecundity, in versatility, in energy, in the frequent application of his poetry to public affairs, in his influence on contemporary literature, position as head of a school and incontestable superiority to all the poets around him, no less, unfortunately, in bombast and incomprehensible breaches of good taste, he strongly reminds us of Victor Hugo. Hugo, undoubtedly, was a much greater lyrical poet than Dryden, and was enkindled by spontaneous inspirations which never visited Dryden; yet the two are essentially of the same genus; the differences between them are rather characteristic of their eras than of themselves; and while Hugo's imagination would have pined in the seventeenth century, Dryden's intellect and Dryden's modesty would have been highly serviceable to Hugo in the nineteenth."

A comparison between Dryden and the Latin poet Claudian here follows, which we omit, to make room for a somewhat lengthy passage from the critique on Bunyan:

"The mind of Bunyan," says Macaulay, 'was so imaginative that personifications, when he dealt with them, became men. A dialogue between two qualities, in his dream, has more dramatic effect than a dialogue between two human beings in most plays.' Macaulay proceeds to compare Bunyan in this particular with Shelley, and the comparison is just; but it is surprising that neither he nor Mr. Froude should have dwelt on Bunyan's deeper affinity to a great predecessor of whom he assuredly never read a line—Dante. Dante's personifications, indeed, are feeble compared to Bunyan's; it is doubtful whether some of them are even intended as such. The might of his imagination, however, like Bunyan's, is shown in his power of reconciling us to its wildest flights by the intensity of his realism; and the chief distinction is that while Bunyan's materials are necessarily drawn from the only worlds he knew, the narrow and prosaic world of Bedford and the sublime world of the Bible, Dante disposed of all his age could give in philosophy, political life, human learning, the influence of art and the scrutiny of nature. Bunyan is hence a very contracted and terrestrial Dante, but so far as he goes he is a true Dante; he cannot soar with his great predecessor, but if Dante had succeeded him he would not have disdained to have built upon his massive groundwork. Both suffer from the inevitable progress of mankind beyond the conceptions which in their day were accepted as matters of course. Dante's Inferno now seems rather grotesque than terrible. Christian's forsaking his kindred in the City of Destruction, which to Bunyan appeared a duty, now seems selfishness. That the fame of both should have survived such profound modifications of belief is one of the most striking evidences of their greatness."

Instances of the comparison of books will be found on p. 132, where Dr. Garnett writes of Wycherly, Vanbrugh, Congreve, and Farquhar:

"Their works may be compared to the works of Mr. George Meredith, who would have been a great comic writer if he had lived in the days of Congreve. No one would call Mr. Meredith's novels unnatural; yet his works will convey but little notion of the English society of the nineteenth century to posterity"— and on p. 178, where Clarendon's and Burnet's Histories are characterised respectively as

"the Iliad and Odyssey of the period, the former a high epical treatment of a single tragic theme, decreed by the Fates and directed by the Gods; the second a bustling, tragic-comedy, true to human nature and crowded with domestic incident."

And, lastly, we may quote a passage in which Dr. Garnett lays a sister art under contribution for the purpose of illustrating the laboured and formal magnificence of Dryden's and Oldham's lyrical compositions:

"A secret and unconscious harmony pervades all branches of the contemporary art of every epoch; and in the stately and somewhat stilted lyrics of Oldham and his compeers we discern the counterpart of the elaborate frontispieces with temples and triumphal arches, chariots and cornucopias, tritons and nereids, which the engravers of the age prefixed to its literature. The engraving is hardly art, and the verse is hardly poetry; we are, nevertheless, conscious of a vigour and a substance which command respect. The work is compact and solid at any rate, and displays much of the force of the Giants, if little of the inspiration of the Gods."

It would be too much to expect that Dr. Garnett, following in the wake of so many distinguished critics, from Dr. Johnson and Sir Walter Scott to Mr. Churton Collins and Prof. Saintsbury, should have found much that was at once new and true to say about Dryden; but he may at least claim the credit of having given us the independent results of his own painstaking study of that writer, and of having made, at all events in one direction, an important contribution to our previous knowledge of his art. It is but bare justice to say that, in his chapter on the Restoration Drama, Dr. Garnett has succeeded in imparting a fresh interest to, and shedding a clearer light upon, a subject hitherto comparatively obscure and uninviting. Our space for quotation is almost exhausted, so that a mere reference must suffice to the paragraph (p. 79) in which Dr. Garnett ingeniously accounts for a phenomenon, frequent in that drama, which has doubtless often puzzled other students besides the present writer: namely, the co-existence, within the compass, it may be, of half a dozen lines, of the wildest and most bombastic transports on the one hand, and of "manly, nervous sense and almost forensic reasoning" on the other. In this connexion, too, we must not omit to mention the remarkable comparison which Dr. Garnett draws (p. 100) between Dryden and Byron as dramatic poets. Of the numerous other writers surveyed by him, Otway, Butler, and Congreve among the poets, John Locke in philosophy, John Bunyan in fiction, and Burnet and Pepys in history and autobiography, have, we think, come off best, although it should be added that to none has anything short of justice been meted out. We append an extract from the delightful account of Pepys, with which we reluctantly take our leave of this most able and entertaining book:

"It is characteristic of Pepys to be at once a very extraordinary and a very ordinary person. In one point of view he is the most perfect representative imaginable of the bourgeois type of humanity—worthy, sensible, indispensable, and at the same time dull, prosaic, and narrow-minded. Yet this solid citizen has a dash of the Gil Blas in him too; and his little rogueries and servilities appear the more amusing by contrast with the really estimable and respectable background of his character. These qualities combined make a perfect hero of autobiography; his ordinary qualities awaken a fellow-feeling for so characteristic a specimen of average humanity, and his deviations from the straight path communicate the piquancy of comedy, sometimes the exuberance of farce. . . . His Diary is by far the most valuable document extant for the understanding of the times; better than all the histories and all the comedies. . . . In it he displays himself to us in almost every possible attitude, attending to accounts, measuring the timber in the dock-yards, giving and taking bribes, alternately a Mercury and a Mentor to his patron, dissipating at the theatre, flirting and something more with actresses and pretty servants, practising music, buying and binding books, a perfect Proteus, yet always the same Pepys, a true type of his age in its peculiar idiosyncrasies, and of human nature in its essential sameness, heroic in no respect, yet admirable in many, and, with many meannesses, by no means despicable, as good an example as can be found of the truth of Goethe's dictum:

"Ein guter Mensch in seinem dunkeln Drange Ist sich des rechten Weges wohl bewusst."

T. HYTHINSON.

The Makers of Modern Rome. By Mrs. Oliphant. (Macmillans.)

THE idea of this book is fascinating, and the title admirably suggestive; for, in truth, from the architects of the Tarquins down to Bernini, the makers of Rome form a great succession. For twenty-five centuries the work has been carried on, and by men of more than one race, and under the most diverse forms of government. Diverse in character the work is, and much of it, indeed the most of it, is now marred and wasted, dwindled and decayed; yet each piece of it, almost without exception, bears the sign-manual of the builder. Moreover, Rome, so often unfortunate, has been lucky in this: that in spite—indeed, partly in consequence—of sieges, captures, floods, and conflagrations, the successive layers of her civilisation now lie apparent, so that the wanderer may read her annals as he walks her streets. Thus the mortarless tufa-blocks on the hill over the Vestals' palace tell of her Etruscan founders, as does the great Cloaca, the earliest round arch of the West. Such relics as the tomb of the Scipios and the Mamertine prison recall the virtues and the savagery of the Republic, while its fall is marked by memorials like the dome of Agrippa and the porticoes of Augustus. To-day Rome is dominated by the structures of the Flavian Caesars as it was when the rank and fashion of the city circled round the Meta sudans, and high rouged dames saluted the bald Nero of the satirist. To-day, too, religious service is held in the temple sacred to the wanton wife of Antoninus, though the only sacrifice it sees now is that of the Christian mass. Colossal works, like the Baths of Caracalla, attest the architectural zeal of the late pagan Caesars, and the great basilicas, both in and without the city, sample the vigour of the dying Christian empire. Nor does the succession stop here. There are structures dating from the time when the sceptre had literally passed from the Tiber to the Bosphorus, and from the long dark centuries that stretch from Theodoric to the Ottos. More plentiful is the work of the spiritual Caesars, the architects of the Papal dominion, and chief among these the Italians who brought back the throne of the Apostle from its ignoble captivity by the waters of the Rhone. These are the great builders of the time of the Renaissance and the Reformation, served by such giants as Michael Angelo; but we must also count in the pontiffs who, when Renaissance and Reformation had spent themselves, were served by such minor talent as Bernini's.

We have given in the baldest and most meagre outline the thoughts that we conceive would occur to everyone who repeats Mrs. Oliphant's title, "The Makers of Modern Rome." Oddly enough, nothing of the kind seems to have presented itself to her mind. She has given us instead four books or chapters, by no means uninteresting, but having, with one exception, only the slenderest connexion with her subject. The exception is the last of the four in which she treats of "The Popes who made the city," or rather of some of them. The rest of the book is devoted to "Honourable Women not a few"; to the "Popes who made the Papacy"; to "Lo Popolo and the Tribune of the People." The honourable women in question are the wealthy ladies of noble Roman houses who, towards the close of the fourth century, found a new and pleasurable excitement in playing at sanctity. They were all extremely wealthy, and the practice of self-imposed abstinence and the casting off of luxury seem to have tickled their jaded palates. A fanatical worship of virginity, as something far above the work-a-day virtues, was one of the distinguishing marks of a community which consisted, so far as we know, chiefly of matrons and widows. Nor could it well have been otherwise, as the movement was largely engineered by St. Jerome, a saint who declared that all the horrors of the Gothic sack of Rome—massacre, rape, pillage, and conflagration—were amply compensated by the open profession of chastity by a single damsel. Mrs. Oliphant finds these Christian précieuses, these Melanias and Marcellas, these Paulas and Asellas and Eustochiums, sympathetic figures. Whether she describes the voluntary nuns in "plain brown dresses" in the luxurious palace on the Aventine, or as hermits in the comfortable seclusion of Egypt or Syria, it is always in a kindly spirit. Perhaps she is a little too benevolent, though in rejecting the scandals that grew out of their easy relations with saints of the opposite sex she is doubtless right. Jerome himself was not universally regarded as a saint: "sceleratus" and "versipellis" are among the epithets flung at him, and he was the furious partisan and servant of that Damasus who won the tiara in a bloody church fight, the singular Pope "quem in tantum matronarum diligebant ut matronarum auriscalpius diceretur." She is right, too, in thinking that, after all, there was little genuine asceticism among these ladies whether at Rome or in the East. Most of them died peacefully, but Marcella was unfortunate enough to be at Rome when it was sacked by Alaric and his Goths; was maltreated and died at S. Paolo fuori le Mura, where, of course, she was in safety. For the Goths, unlike the subsequent captors of Rome, respected the churches, and even helped many women to sanctuary. Still, the house on the Aventine was swept out of existence, and it is as impossible to find Marcella's oratory as to show the habitation of Paula among the rocks of Bethlehem. Nor did this transitory and premature phase of the religious life contribute anything of permanence either to the material aspect or the spiritual development of Rome.

In "The Popes who made the Papacy" Mrs. Oliphant gives a slight sketch of the first and of the seventh Gregory and of the third Innocent. For some inscrutable reason Innocent the Great and Leo the Great are not on her list. The former is just mentioned as having procured from Alaric the immunity of the churches: an obvious fable, for Innocent was absent during both siege and sack, having accompanied a deputation to Ravenna to demand protection from the eunuch-hearted emperor. Probably the tenderness shown by Alaric—so far it was not the outcome of his own Christianity—was due to the remonstrances or appeals of Proba, the widow of Sextus Anicius Probus, the greatest Roman noble of the day. Innocent returned to find Paganism dead, and the Church, with its treasures and buildings unscathed, regarded on all sides as the supreme sanctuary for Rome. Rich when all others were poor, and powerful when all power seemed gone, Innocent wielded in Rome the sceptre of an autocrat. The Christian world, in the person of Augustine, gladly appealed to him as its greatest, and he answers as one having authority over all. What else is the meaning of his lofty commendation to the Bishops:

"qui ad nostrum referendum approbastis esse iudicium, scientes quod Apostolicæ sedi debeatur a quo ipse episcopatus et tota auctoritas nominis hujus emerit."

We mention this because Mrs. Oliphant seems to suggest that the Roman supremacy is a thing of much later date. This is barely true of the claim to the supreme title; it is quite untrue of the claim to supremacy. The exclusion of Leo is even more remarkable than that of Innocent. He stands, if ever Pope did, for Rome's ambition, for her inflexible persistence, for her haughtiness of speech, for her belief in her indefeasible title to obedience. It was Leo who turned back the Scourge of God from the helpless city. It was Leo who, in proud assumption of the admitted primacy of Rome, declared Antioch and Alexandria insulted by the pretensions of Constantinople to deprive them of the second and third rank. It was Leo who stood on the rock of Peter in a world swarming with heresy, and yielded neither to Council nor Emperor in assertion of orthodoxy. Yet he is not counted as one of the Popes who made the Papacy.

Of the three Popes that Mrs. Oliphant thus honours, the most important figure is that of Gregory I. Much legend has clung round his name, but there are few medieval personages who stand out so clearly through the mists of time. Though neither a great scholar nor a great theologian, nor a great Churchman in the sense in which we apply that term to Hildebrand and Innocent, "the third founder of the Papacy" was at least the author of the popular Catholic religion, the establisher of Roman authority "over the hearts of men." More than this, as "Consul of God," he brought the new Christianity of the barbarian world to redress the balance of the old. Rich and noble, one of the Anicii, a Prefect of the city, he brought to his great office incomparable administrative gifts, and a passion for humanity that makes him the most lovable of saints, Francis of Assisi alone excepted. Never had Rome been brought so low as in his time. Wars, famines, pestilences, had thinned her population. The Lombard had cut her off from all connexion with Ravenna and the East, when Gregory single-handed extorted peace from the stubborn Agilulf. To him the victorious barbarian sent embassies, and asked for his signature to the treaty. But he refused this royal function, though he had been ready enough to do the work of a king. So, too, he alone of the great

The familiar story of Hildebrand is one of the most picturesque in history; it is excellently told by Mrs. Oliphant, who, in respect of the famous penance at Canossa, justly insists that, after all, nothing came of it. Great as was the daring displayed by the Pope in his long struggle with Henry, it must not be forgotten that the third of the Franconian emperors was only a poor creature, and the result might have been different had Gregory been confronted with Barbarossa. The House of Hohenstaufen itself went down, it is true, before the persistent enmity of Rome; but this was not so much due to the increased strength of the Papacy as to the growing weakness of the Empire. North of the Alps the imperial weakness was a legacy from the Henrician anarchy; south, it was due to the rise of a new enemy, the Italian commune. As Hildebrand marks the beginning of the flood, so Innocent III. marks the high tide of Papal power and pretension. And here Mrs. Oliphant exploits with great skill another familiar story. Hildebrand is the low-born priest to whom the Church is all; Innocent is a noble, with the feelings and some of the chivalry of his class; and the two characters are nicely discriminated. When the young Raymond of Toulouse, dispossessed from his heretical lordship, asks to be allowed to win back his own from the Pope's champion, Montfort, Innocent replies, "May God give thee grace to begin it well and finish it better." It is non-committal, perhaps, but how differently would Hildebrand have spoken to the son of an excommunicated foe.

After the exclusion of Innocent the Great and Leo, the admission of Cola di Rienzi among the Makers of Rome is not surprising. Mrs. Oliphant tells her somewhat trite story in a lively fashion; but on the chief point of interest in his history—how he came to impose on his contemporaries—she throws no light. For it was not only the mob that took this frothy tapageur seriously; and, after even the mob had found him out, Petrarch wrote: "I had placed my last hope of Italian liberty on him."

It is not till she reaches the last division of her book that Mrs. Oliphant really gets to her subject—the great Popes of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries who loved "guerrare e murare." Martin V. was elected in 1417, and came back to Rome a few years later. With him begins the list of the builders of the city of the Renaissance—the makers of the Papal kingdom in Italy. They were all sorts and conditions of men: scions of great houses, like Martin the Colonna and Pius the Piccolomini; low-born men like Thomas of Sarzana. Some were chiefly scholars and collectors; some were great fighters and intriguers, like Alexander Borgia and Julius II. Some combined all these characters, like Sixtus IV. But all, with a few exceptions, sought to beautify the city: to build, to pull down, to restore. Mrs. Oliphant's excellent sketch stops prematurely with Leo X. He died in 1521-2, but the remodelling of the city went on for a century and a half longer. St. Peter's was not consecrated till 1626, and Bernini's colonnades, which give the special character to the approach, were still later work. Three-fourths of the great palaces were built in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries by Popes or their descendants, and the Farnese, Oenci, Massimi, Orsini, Borghese, and Rospigliosi (among others) are all later than the pontificate of Leo. However, so far as the authoress takes us, she is an agreeable companion, and her silhouettes of the Popes from Martin onwards are skilfully cut. Leo she calls "the urbane and skilful Medici, great to take advantage of the divine slaves that were ready for his service." This is certainly happy, and, indeed, the book contains many vivid passages; while Mrs. Oliphant's unwearying search after the good, even in men she is bound to condemn, is useful in reminding us that there must have been a cheerful side to many dark characters.

REGINALD HUGHES.

Letters and Verses of Arthur Penrhyn Stanley. Edited by Rowland E. Prothero. (John Murray.)

THIS volume is a basket of fragments from more than one feast. Mr. Prothero has already used up what was most interesting in Stanley's correspondence for his charming biography of the Dean; and much of the remainder had long before been used up by the writer himself in his various works, especially Sinai and Palestine. What now appears for the first time is not very characteristic: it lacks the personal note. Of Stanley the soldier in the war for the liberation of humanity we see almost nothing; nothing of the lovable, helpless child of light; little of the Oxford professor; perhaps too much of the courtier; far too much of the itinerant scene-painter. I never read Dr. Syntax, but the hero of that burlesque, however much he differed from the Dean, could not have been more ardent or unwearied in his search for the picturesque. From the Alhambra to the Kremlin, from Karnak to Niagara, he pounds away steadily with results which will, no doubt, be most useful to Mr. Augustus Hare some day, but which are a little cloying when taken after the manner of Shalott. Stanley seldom strikes out an impressive phrase that sticks in the memory. I have only remarked one such in the present volume. It is where, in describing the view from Monte Generoso, he calls it "a vision as of another world, ethereal as air, yet solid with the solidity of eternity" (p. 378). Even here one notices a want of ear, which, together with other deficiencies, accounts for the very poor quality of the numerous verses here inflicted on us. Fun of any sort is also rare. Here is one of the few instances. In exploring the Roman fortress of Borcovicus, Stanley and his friends came across a certain trough.

"Antony Place, an old labourer of eighty-one, who has long lived on the spot, on being asked his opinion of the use of the trough, expressed his belief that it was where 'the Romans washed their Scottish prisoners'" (p. 355).

Putting aside possibilities of picturesque description with or without a slight religious tinge, this correspondence shows little interest in contemporary persons or events. On hearing that the Comte de Chambord was likely to be proclaimed King of France, Stanley rushed from Rome to Paris in order to witness the expected ceremony; but, apart from the chance of another pageant to add to his already large collection, it seems to have been a matter of total indifference to him whether the monarchical or the republican cause prevailed among our neighbours.

A slight preference for continental to English society may be observed in Stanley's letters. Villemain, De Saulsy, and De Tocqueville are "all more agreeable than their English parallels" (p. 249). He is delighted with Neander, and longs to transplant him into England (p. 91). It seems to him a pleasing trait in Ranke—"at least one would be surprised to hear the same of Hallam or Macaulay"—that he has taken up Hebrew again, and reads the Psalms in Hebrew with his wife in the evenings (p. 90). Schelling receives him "with great kindness; not like Schlegel, with the air of a man who likes to be visited as a distinguished man, but with real, simple, German friendliness" (p. 88). The old philosopher (this was in 1845)

"spoke with a very kindly feeling of Coleridge . . . had defended him in his lectures against the charge in Blackwood of plagiarism from himself; and expressed his gratitude to him for 'having in one striking expression on my theology (that it was tautological and not allegorical) collected all that I have thought out in many hours'" (p. 89).

A. W. Schlegel, whom Stanley contrasts with Schelling, is described as "a very little man with a neat brown curly wig, a coat between a frock-coat and a great-coat, no neckcloth, and a reddish face with a long nose" (p. 50). He was much amused to hear about the "tea-total" (sic) movement in England, and declaimed against tea-drinking at great length in voluble English.

"Why, there is a sort of superstition about it. Beer is, like it, a decoction of an herb, and beer can do no harm, for Tacitus speaks of it as being used in the heroic times of Germany. We have a specimen of what a nation becomes by drinking tea; there are the Chinese, who have drunk it for 1600 years, and now they are so effeminate that they never go out for fear of catching cold, and all their soldiers are packed in cotton wool. That is what you will become by drinking tea. . . . And then China is the only country where tea is grown. The Emperor of China might, by shutting up his harbours, make you the most unhappy people in the world" (p. 52).

This delightful type of omniscient, good-humoured, scolding German professor long survived Schlegel, but is, I fear, becoming extinct.

The penalties of omniscience are vividly brought before us by an incident in a happy day spent with Sir John Herschel and Whewell, on which the latter came out strong as an archaeologist. Unfortunately a certain doctor "caught Whewell at the end of the evening, and very abruptly asked him, 'What is your opinion as to the best slope of the sails of windmills?' Surprised to find that Whewell had not made up his mind—'Oh! I thought you had written a book upon it. I thought you had written a book upon everything.' I believe it was mere simplicity; but the bystanders tell me that it had the most ludicrous effect" (p. 292).

On the same occasion Herschel declared that philology and not astronomy was his proper vocation.

Far the strongest impression of personal charm in this volume is conveyed by a few appearances of Jowett. On one of his visits to Paris (March, 1856), Stanley saw at St. Germain the parents of Melchizedek (as he called his kinless friend)—

"a truly antique and venerable pair, each bearing a slight resemblance to the son, each with some of the qualities in him concentrated; very kind and rapt in interest concerning him, relating singular stories of his childhood—how deeply historical he then was, studying Rollin's Ancient History, well versed in Assyrian dynasties, standing long in silent contemplation of a 'Stream of Time' suspended in his little bedroom. This historical phase passed away into the philosophical on his going to school, and has never returned. Deeply musical also, he listens with pleasure to Beethoven played by his sister, and even proposes corrections" (pp. 248, 249).

Jowett's letters chiefly relate to the death of friends, and are very touching. One is about George Eliot:

"I do feel greatly the death of Mrs. Cross, who is a friend never to be replaced. She was one of the few persons eminent in literature whose conversation was equal or even superior to her writings. She made one great, though excusable mistake, in her own life. But, with this exception, she was a remarkably good woman, especially in all womanly qualities, absolutely free from vanity, jealousy, and every form of egoism, and her influence over young men was entirely good and pure. I always sympathised with her marriage with Mr. Cross (who was her devoted admirer and quite worthy of her for his moral qualities), for it gave her six months of unalloyed happiness. . . . Dear Mrs. Cross was buried to-day in the Highgate cemetery. About this time last week she was first discovered to be dangerously ill. Dr. Andrew Clark came to see her, looked at her, and said to the general practitioner, 'Morituro'" (p. 445).

Stanley at thirty-four believed himself to have learned more from Jowett than from anyone else since Arnold's removal. But their paths soon diverged, and the intellectual separation continued to widen through life. The one took for his portion the surface and flower of things, the other their depth and root. Long afterwards, when Stanley had only a year to live, the Master expressed in the kindest, gentlest manner imaginable his dissatisfaction with his friend's career. "Forty years ago we all expected you to be the most distinguished man among us, and you must not disappoint us." Stanley is the most distinguished clergyman in the Church of England, and can do more than anyone towards the great work of placing religion on a rational basis. For that purpose he must devote the rest of his life to the preparation of a great work on theology, a labour which will require him "to withdraw a good deal from society" (pp. 443, 444). We do not hear how the Dean responded to this somewhat naïve demand; but his answer had been virtually given a few years before. Referring to Lady Augusta's dying injunctions, to work on and go to the very bottom of things, to make his forthcoming volume perfect, the sorrowing survivor reads in them a rebuke to his own superficiality, but feels that "in making these requirements she was aiming too high and asking for impossibilities" (pp. 408, 409).

But there were compensations. Dean Stanley's Life is dedicated by permission to the Queen; five of his letters, printed in this volume, are addressed to the same august personage; and another letter of his about Prince Albert has been honoured with a marginal note of approval from the hand of Her Majesty.

ALFRED W. BENN.

Strangers at Lisconnel. By Jane Barlow. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

AN authority on idylls says, rather testily: "After the use made of the word by Tennyson in his Idylls of the King, which are epic in their style and treatment, and romantic and tragic in their incidents, it becomes very difficult to say what may not be called an idyll."

This is cowardly, to put the mildest censure on it. Surely a man and a scholar, after reading poems epic in their style and treatment, and romantic and tragic in their incidents, should find it very easy to say: "There are compositions which may not be called idylls; of such are these poems of the King." I will not believe that even the shade of Tennyson could be set a-quiver by a quiet, polite comment to that effect.

Meanwhile, it is here not so important to decide what is not an idyll, as it is to decide what an idyll is. The word "idyll," looked into, is seen to mean "a little picture"; and all the best idyll-makers, from Theocritus to Jane Barlow, have given us little pictures. For a little picture it might naturally be supposed that one would choose a little subject, a cottage rather than a castle, Little Claus rather than Big Claus. This, again, is what the best idyll-makers have always done, even when the doing of it must have gone somewhat against the grain. The great pastoral poet of Greece makes an infamous act the theme of his eulogy because the doer of it was Ptolemy; the great pastoral poet of Greece was partial to royalty, but he did not make royalty dominate in his idylls: Lycidas was a goat-herd. Goat-herds, harvestmen, fishermen—these we meet in the famed idylls of Greece. Very different they are from their brother-craftsmen whom we have known in the flesh. If Theocritus has drawn them truthfully, the explanation of this fact is to be found in the time and the clime in which they lived. Their world was younger than ours by two thousand years, the sky above them was a Sicilian one. Well might they, in the world's youth and world's garden, live a life so free from care that they had to "make up" their sorrows! It is profitless, perhaps, but it is rather tempting, to conjecture what would have happened to them if they had been sent "jumping o'er times"

(the bold phrase is Shakspeare's) to our time, and if they had been brought to a standstill at Lisconnel, among goat-herds, harvestmen, and fishermen, in a world older by two thousand years, with an Irish sky over this bit of it, among folk whose life is so laden with care that they have to "make up" their joys. My feeling is that even Lycidas, who, goat-herd as he was, could recite poems of his own composition upon occasion, would have succumbed to what to any but a grey eye or so—an Irish eye—would seem lamentably lacking in matter for poetry.

It is impossible to praise in excess the consummate skill with which Miss Barlow has made anew "little pictures" of the loveliest, with this drear Lisconnel for background, and in the foreground nothing brighter than the blue of Mrs. Kilfoyle's cloak for what painters call "a point of colour." They who echo the famous German who said Ich habe alle Zwoitenmale may put down Strangers at Lisconnel at once; for it is nothing but what it calls itself, "A Second Series of Irish Idylls," no better than the first, because better could not be, but as good—a fact which should be emphasised, because there are people who think that as good could not be. "Jerry Dunne's Basket" is as witty as any story in the first series, and is notable on another account. Till it appeared Daudet's little tale called "La Mule du Pape" was probably the best story of this kind yet told: it is now the second best, Miss Barlow's being by just as much better than it as an Irish toss of the head is better—more sweet and commendable—than a French kick. "Jerry Dunne's Basket" tells of an Irish toss of the head, and "La Mule du Pape" tells of a French kick.

Of the pathetic stories, more especially among them "Mrs. Kilfoyle's Cloak," "A Good Turn," "Boys' Wages," "Con the Quare One," I should like to write at great length, but space forbids. It is here possible only to give a few of the many passages in these tales and others which one marks as showing "the quality" of them. We are taken out of the bogland for a look abroad:

"The road climbs to the top of a hill, and stops there abruptly, as if it had been travelling all the while merely to look at the view."

There is only one writer living who could have written that, and only one writer living who could have written this:

"The shower was a vicious one, with the sting of sleet and hail in its drops, pelted about by gusts that ruffled up the puddles into ripples, all set on end, like the feathers of a frightened hen."

As a sample of Miss Barlow's own satire, which is real Irish point, take this:

"Ody was leaning against the wall, critically examining Brian Kilfoyle's blackthorn, and forming a poor opinion of it with considerable satisfaction. Not that he bore Brian any ill-will, but because this was his method of attaining to contentment with his own possessions."

Sometimes there is a sounding of the profundities: "'What was there in it,' asks Thady, 'before the beginnin' of everythin'?"

"Thady was a small, anxious-looking child, whose pale and peaky face his mother often likened regretfully to a ha'porth of soap after a week's washing. He had spent a surprisingly considerable part of his six years in metaphysical speculations, and was always disposed to make a personal grievance of the difficulties in which they constantly landed him. His tone was now rather peremptory as he repeated, 'What was there in it before the beginnin' of everythin'?"

"'Sure, nothin' at all,' said his elder brother, Peter, to whom the answer seemed quite simple and satisfactory. But Joanna looked as if she had caught sight of some distant object, which provoked hard staring.

"'Then, what was there before the beginnin' of nothin'?' pursued Thady.

"'Dunno,' said Peter indifferently; 'unless it was more nothin'.'

"'Sure, not at all; that wouldn't be the way of it,' Joanna said dreamily, yet with decision. 'If there was nothin' but nothin' in it, there'd ha' been apt to not be e'er an anythin' ever. Where'd it ha' come from? Don't be tellin' the child lies, Peter. Why, for one thing,' she said, her tone sharpening polemically and taking a touch of triumph, 'there was always God Almighty in it, and the Divil. Maybe that's what you call nothin'.'

"Peter evaded this point, saying —"

What Peter said will be found in the tale called "Con the Quare One." I do not give it, for two reasons. I want the reader to go to the book, and I want to give another passage. You are to know that a theft has been perpetrated in Lisconnel. A thief has appeared there; his appearance is followed by that of policemen.

"It might seem on the face of things that the arrival of two active and stalwart civil servants would have been welcomed as happening just in the nick of time; yet it argues an alien ignorance to suppose such a view of the matter by any means possible. The men in invisible green tunics belonged completely to the category of pitaty-blights, rint-warnin's, fevers, and the like devastators of life, that dog a man more or less all through it, but close in on him, a pitiful quarry, when the bad seasons come, and the childer and the old crathurs are starvin' wid the hunger, and his own heart is broke; therefore to accept assistance from them in their official capacity would have been a proceeding most reprehensibly unnatural. To put a private quarrel or injury into the hands of the peelers were a disloyal making of terms with the public foe; a condoning of great permanent wrongs for the sake of a trivial temporary convenience. Lisconnel has never been skilled in the profitable and useful art of utilising its enemies. Not that anybody was more than vaguely conscious of these sentiments, much less attempted to express them in set terms. When a policeman appeared there was an inquiring mood; what people said among themselves was: 'Musha, ook him up. I hope he'll get his health till I would be tellin' him,' or words to that effect; while in reply to his questions they made statements superficially so clear and simple, and essentially so bewilderingly involved, that the longest experience could do little more for a constable than teach him the futility of wasting his time in attempts to disentangle them."

There is a very general idea in England that Ireland's history has been written by Moore, Lecky, Froude, Keating, and some others; and there has grown up a practice of late years of rather industriously studying these writers, who are some of them interesting, but are none of them quite reliable. It is a curious fact that the writer who is the best historian that Ireland has yet had, Miss Jane Barlow, is not only more reliable than any of the historians named above, but is also immeasurably more interesting than any of them. Froude is considered by those who do not trust him wholly to have had a pretty wit. It becomes very ugly when compared with wit like the above. Perhaps it is, after all, not for nothing that Irish wit is accounted the prettiest in the world.

Lakewood. By Mary H. Norris. (F. A. Stokes.)

The Red Badge of Courage. By Stephen Crane. (Heinemann.)

THERE are certain novelists of established reputation who no longer need commonplace criticism. According to the phrase of the Salon, they may claim to be treated as hors concours. It would be utterly superfluous to say of any new book from the pen of Mr. Thomas Hardy that it was powerful, or dramatic, or artistic, or to use any other of those eulogistic epithets which a reviewer is sometimes compelled by stress of circumstances to adopt. Above all, it should be unnecessary to state that the author is throughout true to nature. Yet it is precisely on this last point that a reader of Jude the Obscure might be inclined to raise the question, whether some limits ought not to be placed upon the measure of realism that may be imported into fiction. Mere imitation of nature is confessedly not synonymous with art. No painter or sculptor, whether working from the nude or not, would reproduce in every particular exactly what is shown by a photograph. Nor does there seem to be any reason why the novelist—who is not compelled, as is the artist or sculptor, to represent every detail—should hold himself bound to introduce, by way of giving additional veracity to his narrative, subjects which by common consent are avoided in our ordinary conversation. This view of the matter will be appreciated by anyone who reads, for instance, pp. 41-47 of the book under notice. For the rest, Mr. Hardy's book is fully up to the mark of his previous performances, and, as we have already said, may to that extent be allowed the compliment of exemption from criticism.

Considerable advantage is often gained for a work of fiction by the narrative being placed in the mouth of one of the less important characters, who, being for the most part a spectator, may be presumed to see all the more of the game. Mrs. Neal's Friend or Rival is a story purporting to be told by Miss Ruth Wilmot, of Monkswell Park, concerning Miss Vera Aveling, the daughter by a former marriage of her father's second wife. The loves of Vera Aveling and Percival Leicester, the rector's son, would probably have run smoothly, had not the former, while on a visit to Oxford during the boating week, made the acquaintance of Sergius Orme, of New College, one of the most brilliant young scholars of the day, who at once bestows his affections upon her, and apparently receives a good deal of encouragement. This Sergius Orme is one of Percival's dearest friends, in spite of the fact that he has beaten the latter as a boy in the struggle to win what Mrs. Neal calls "the" Winchester scholarship—unaware, apparently, that some ten or a dozen of these prizes are offered every year for competition—and again, when leaving Winchester, in the examination for a New College scholarship. He is English on his father's side; but his mother, a Russian princess, was banished to Siberia soon after his birth, and the fixed purpose of his life is to rescue or avenge her. However, his determination to win Vera Aveling takes precedence of this purpose; and the main crisis of the tale is reached when, by a false declaration of his engagement to her, he induces her equally ardent lover, Percival, to undertake the journey to Siberia in his place. This furnishes a strong situation, and the subsequent scenes are deftly handled. The author writes in pleasant and effective style, and some of her descriptions of college life at Oxford are exceedingly well done.

A beautiful fiend is always a creature who captivates the imagination. In Zalma Mr. Ellis presents us with a powerfully drawn and highly coloured portrait of a woman fitted to hold her own among the female demons of the world's history. Zalma Pahlen, beautiful as Venus and wicked as Messalina, or Theodora, or Catharine de Medici; her wrongs and her revenges; her polygamistic alliances and illicit amours; her extraordinary intellectual ability and grasp of scientific theories—these form a theme for a stirring and absorbing narrative, to which Mr. Ellis does full justice. He possesses a rare faculty for laying politics, science, ethics, and many other departments of knowledge under contribution in constructing his narrative; and in this respect we are reminded more of Disraeli and Lytton in reading his book than of the style prevailing nowadays in fiction. It should be mentioned that this diabolical heroine, Zalma, is the daughter of a man who may be described as the head-centre of the Anarchist organisation, and after his death finishes her career by an attempt to "scatter micro-organisms, the germs of the disease Anthrax, over the metropolitan and great provincial centres of Europe and America by means of balloons," with a view to causing wholesale destruction of human life by some process less cumbrous and less limited in its effects than dynamite. After this the reader may be prepared for anything in the way of sensation.

There seems to be as much room for class fiction in the novel-reading world as there is for class journals in the world of trade. Mrs. Robert Jocelyn shares with Mrs. Edward Kennard the position once occupied by Captain Hawley Smart, of special contributor to the amusement of that portion of the public whose chief delight is hunting. A Dangerous Brute suggests its subject-matter by its title. It is a record of the career of a hunter, sound in wind and limb, a flyer across country, and possessing phenomenal abilities as a jumper, but endowed with a temper so incorrigibly vicious that the most daring of cross-country riders seldom care to have more than one experience upon his back. He passes from hand to hand, and, after breaking several arms and legs, and at least one neck, has at last to be shot as a brute too dangerous to be let live. It is scarcely likely that the vast multitude of people who never bestride a horse in the course of their lives will take much pleasure in perusing these pages, but the book will be duly appreciated by the class of persons for whom it is intended. It is written in easy and not too horsey style; but the employment throughout of names suggestive of personal qualities—such as Mr. Green, Mr. Sharp, Mr. Timid, Mr. Gohard, Mr. Boaster, &c.—reminds one of the Pilgrim's Progress and other pious allegories of our youth, and is scarcely appropriate, one would think, to the dignity of a sporting novel.

Galloping Dick is a collection of six autobiographical stories of adventure on the road, narrated by Dick Ryder, highwayman of the seventeenth century. As each of the six has already appeared in the pages of a magazine, they are familiar to a considerable number of people, and require only a brief notice. As is usual with this class of fiction, the leading character, although a professional thief and cut-throat, is represented as a gentleman of unusually good education and highly cultivated manners, and able to hold his own in polite repartee with the most high-born of his victims. The incidents are in nearly every case of an amusing character, and are related in the quaint language of the period, which the author has reproduced with much skill; but one feels doubtful as to his accuracy in many points of detail. It would, for instance, be interesting to know whether the expression "a triangular duel," familiar enough to us ever since the publication of Mr. Midshipman Easy, was really in vogue in the days of Charles the Second. And Mr. Ryder can hardly be correct when he says that "at eight of the clock on that fifth of June I set out from Sutton Valence [Sutton Veney], astride upon Calypso, and by midday drew up at a little village a league or so to the side of Bath."

The object which Mr. Blatchford appears to have had in writing Tommy Atkins is to present a picture of the ordinary garrison life of privates and non-commissioned officers at the present day. There certainly is room in our literature for some record of the kind. The British private soldier does not often engage the attention of novelists, and we know singularly little of his ways and habits inside the barrack walls. The author of the book under notice does not exhibit any remarkable aptitude for a task of this kind, in the sense of being able to entertain us with humorous scenes or thrilling situations, but he seems to have been at great pains to study the idioms of language peculiar to the class he is describing and the details of regimental drill and routine. Judging from his account, we gather that military regulations encourage the growth and existence of much petty tyranny, and that the private soldier is little contented with his lot, and divides the spare time at his disposal between the amusements of drinking, fighting, and love-making.

Readers having a partiality for gossip pure and simple are recommended to try Lakewood, a charmingly written story of the kind. Lakewood is a fashionable winter resort within easy distance of New York; and here, at the date of the present story, are congregated innumerable families of wealth and position, some residing in private houses hired for the season, but the larger portion occupying rooms at the two principal hotels, which, after the manner of such American establishments, seem to have no limit to their accommodation. It would be impossible to describe in any detail a book which deals with at least a score of families, and has three or four separate plots, all having for their object the arrangement of a marriage between some loving couple. Wealth and luxury make all things comfortable, and no unhappy incident occurs to mar a generally blissful termination.

Another American book is The Red Badge of Courage, being an episode of the Civil War. The author, in quaint, bantering style, describes some military operations, and presents us with a running analysis of a young soldier's varying emotions during the course of the campaign. It must be confessed that the narrative soon becomes tiresome. A serio-comic effect seems to be intended throughout, and Mr. Crane is no doubt highly gifted with that grotesqueness of fancy which is peculiarly a Transatlantic production; but the humour is scarcely of a sort to be appreciated by readers on this side, and not a few of them will lay the book down before getting half way through.

JOHN BARROW ALLEN.

DALMON'S SONG FAVOURS.

Song Favourites. By C. W. Dalmon. (John Lane.)

MR. DALMON'S songs taste decidedly of "Flora and the country green," and their savour is uncommonly pleasant in not a few examples. If Mr. Dalmon does not expressly present himself as crowned with flowers, presiding over some May-day revels under the elm-tree shade, there is much in his pretty volume that suggests the picture. Like Herrick, he sings of pastoral and Arcadian joys, of birds and bees and flowers, of sylvan delights, and rural loves and pastimes. Like

Herrick, again, he has his Anacreontics, though they are of a milder description than those of the vicar of Dean Prior. Yet, if he does not

"Sing thy praise, Iacchus, Who with thy thyrses doth thwack us," there is a jocund spirit in his songs in praise of beer and cider and other non-vinous potations. Even "rum and milk," a beverage that is somewhat cloying, like mead, and a trifle heady, has moved Mr. Dalmon to a fine outpouring of lyric rapture:

"Now some may drink to ladies fine,
With painted cheek and gowns of silk;
But we will drink to dairymaids
In pocket mugs of rum and milk!
O, 'tis up in the morning early,
When the dew is on the grass,
And St. John's bell rings for matins,
And St. Mary's rings for mass!"

"The merry skylarks soar and sing,
And seem to Heaven very near—
Who knows what blessed inns they see,
What holy drinking songs they hear?
O, 'tis up in the morning early, &c.

"The mushrooms may be priceless pearls
A queen has lost beside the stream,
But rum is melted rubies when
It turns the milk to golden cream!
O, 'tis up in the morning early, &c."

Pleasant it is to note the poet's adoption of the old poetic meaning of "inn" in the second stanza of this delightful song. A graver note is sounded in the striking stanzas "An Autumn Elegy," with their august images and deep-toned harmonies. This is a poem that might alone suffice to prove that Mr. Dalmon has not merely drank of the well-springs of Jacobean singers, but is by election of that brotherhood, and a poet of individual inspiration. Here, and in one or two other poems, it must be noted that Mr. Dalmon has not altogether avoided reminiscent touches; not always, be it observed, with regard to seventeenth century poetry. Longfellow, for example, makes the dying Year tell his beads "in drops of rain." But Mr. Dalmon is never a bald imitator and a mere conveyor of the literal echo. In the "Autumn Elegy" the figure of the Old Year moving towards his cloistered retirement leads by a natural development of poetic reflection to a noble sequence of imaginative imagery:

"Now 'tis fitting, and becomes us all,
To think how fast our time of being fades;
The Year puts down his mead-cup with a sigh,
And kneels, deep in the red and yellow glades,
And tells his beads like one about to die;

"For when the last leaves fall
He must away unto a bare, cold cell,
In White St. Winter's monastery; there
To do hard penance for the joys that were,
Until the New Year tolls his passing bell."

The rest of the poem falls not away from this imposing opening. Several of the lighter songs, such as "Rainbow Gold," "Night Shades," "An Autumn Allegory," possess a truly witching grace. In others the "wood-notes wild" charm by their purity and freshness and happy inevitableness. Especially am I interested in Mr. Dalmon's poetic regard for old customs and faiths. In conclusion, therefore, I give myself the pleasure of quoting one more example, since it records with becoming grace an ancient superstition that yet lingers in certain rural districts of England:

"Lilies very white and sweet
Cover her from head to feet,
Underneath the linen sheet.

"And such beauty fills the place
When I lift the square of lace
From her little marble face!

"For a baby's soul, they say,
Very seldom flies away
From its empty shell of clay

"Till the service of the dead
In the graveyard has been said,
And the corse is buried.

"Then it is that I shall weep,
When I can no longer peep
At my darling fast asleep!"

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. HEINEMANN announces for publication in the spring The Paget Papers, in two volumes, being the memoirs and despatches of Sir Arthur Paget, brother of the first Marquis of Anglesey, who was British envoy at various continental courts during the Napoleonic period. The policy of Prussia between Holland and Poland, the attitude of Bavaria, the temper of the Neapolitan kingdom, were all brought under his notice from 1792 to 1800. After the Peace of Amiens, he watched from the court of Vienna the building up of the Third Coalition, and was with the Emperor during the campaign of Austerlitz; while his final mission carried him to the Dardanelles, where the same political play was then being gone through as has been witnessed quite recently. The volumes will be edited by Sir Arthur's son, Sir Augustus Paget, late ambassador at Vienna, and will be illustrated with numerous portraits of the chief contemporary figures.

THE first volume of the series of "Royal Naval Handbooks," of which Commander Robinson is the editor-in-chief, will be published by Messrs. Bell about the end of this month. In this handbook Admiral Sir Vesey Hamilton, late First Sea Lord of the Admiralty, deals with the subject of Naval Administration: the general working and various functions of the Admiralty. It has been his aim to make his work useful to the statesman and student, as well as interesting to the general reader. It will be followed shortly by volumes on The Machinery of a Man-of-War, by Fleet-Engineer Oldknow; and on Torpedoes and Torpedo Vessels, by Lieutenant George Armstrong. The latter will include a chapter contributed by an officer who was present both at the battle of the Yalu and at Wei-hai-wei, giving details of the effects of torpedo warfare from personal experience. All the volumes of the series will be illustrated.

WE understand that a Life of Sergius Stepniak is in preparation, by his widow. Prince Krapotkin will edit the Russian section of the book, and several English writers will contribute chapters on Stepniak's work in art and literature. Mme. Stepniak desires that all who have letters or reminiscences of interest regarding her husband's life will communicate with her at 22, Ormiston-road, Uxbridge-road, London.

AMONG the many editions of Burns which are to be published this season is one which will appear in Messrs. Bliss, Sands & Foster's series of "Cheapest Books in the World," uniform with the Arabian Nights and Robinson Crusoe. It is intended to be one of the most complete yet issued, with a portrait. The poems and songs will be in single columns, in large type, forming 578 demy octavo pages. Later there will follow, in the same series, a careful reprint of the first English edition of Uncle Tom's Cabin, with a frontispiece by Cruikshank.

THE new volume of the "Gentleman's Magazine Library" will be the seventh of the topographical series, containing contributions concerning the counties of Lincoln, Leicester, Middlesex, and Monmouth, to the old Gentleman's Magazine. The usual introduction and index will accompany the volume.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. will shortly publish a new novel, by Mr. Edmund Mitchell, entitled Towards the Eternal Snows. As in the case of the author's first book, "The Temple of Death," the scene is laid in India, where he has spent much of his time in making himself acquainted with districts that are little known.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN announces a story by Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim, to be entitled A Modern Prometheus.

A NOVEL by Mr. Harry Lander, entitled Stages in the Journey, will be published immediately by Messrs. A. D. Innes & Co. The characters live in the Bohemia of art, the stage, and journalism.

MESSRS. SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. will publish shortly By your Leaves, Gentle Men! a poem in reply to Mr. W. Watson's "Apologia," together with some other poems and fragments, by Bertram.

A CHEAP edition of the second series of Mr. Augustine Birrell's Obiter Dicta will be issued by Mr. Elliot Stock very shortly.

MR. KARL BLIND will have an article, in the forthcoming number of the Pall Mall Magazine, on "Barthélemy St. Hilaire and the Rhine Frontier," containing curious revelations from a correspondence between the two.

BARON FERDINAND ROTHSCHILD has been elected a trustee of the British Museum.

THE publishing firm of Macmillan & Co. has been converted into a limited liability company. This change, which has been made for family reasons, will not in any way affect the conduct of the business; as the directors, Mr. George Lillie Craik and Messrs. Frederick, George, and Maurice Macmillan, were all partners in the late firm, and the whole of the shares are held by them and by the trustees of the late Alexander Macmillan.

THE annual general meeting of the Incorporated Society of Authors will be held on Monday next, at 4.30 p.m., at 20, Hanover-square, when the following motions will be brought forward: (1) Proposed by Sir W. Martin Conway, and seconded by Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins:

"That a committee of the members of the society be appointed by the members to confer with a sub-committee of the committee of management as to changes to be made in the constitution of the society, with the object of making the managing body more representative of the members."

(2) Proposed by Mr. W. H. Wilkins:

"That this meeting repudiates the address headed 'The Authors of England to the Authors of America,' and regrets that the society was in any way connected with it."

THE Goldsmiths' Institute Literary Society will hold a special meeting on Tuesday next, at 8 p.m., at their hall, New Cross, to commemorate the anniversary of Charles Lamb's birth.

ON Friday of this week, Messrs. Sotheby were to begin the sale of the valuable collection of books and MSS., which has long been in the possession of the Frere family, of Boydon Hall, Norfolk. Among the MSS. are a number of the original Paston Letters, the famous Tylney Book of Hours of the fourteenth century, and numerous historical documents. The books include the first edition of Pericles, many other Elizabethan quartos, three early Latin tracts from the press of Wynkyn de Worde, Sir John Fenton's copy of Ames's Typographical Antiquities (barbarously illustrated with six original leaves of Caxton's printing), and a series of presentation copies of Coleridge. This will be followed next week by the sale of books and MSS., scarcely less interesting, from different collections. Here the chief attractions are a signature of Adrian IV. (Nicholas Break-spear), the only English Pope; and a copy of Forster's Life of Dickens, extended with portraits, autograph letters, &c., to make thirteen folio volumes.

WE understand that Sir James H. Ramsay, author of Lancaster and York, is disposed to offer himself as a candidate for the Ford Lectureship in English history, which has just been founded at Oxford.

IN Convocation at Oxford next Tuesday, it will be proposed to confer the degree of M.A., by decree of the house, on Mr. W. H. Stevenson, the newly elected research fellow of Exeter.

THE general board of studies at Cambridge has approved Mr. J. N. Langley for the degree of Doctor in Science.

At the meeting held on Thursday of this week, Dr. Fennell was to read a paper on "The Range and Cause of Changes of Indo-Germanic i-sounds in early Sanskrit, with reference to the paper on 'The Sanskrit Liquids' in Darbishire's Reliquiae Philologicae."

PROF. H. A. MIERES, who was recently elected to the reconstituted Waynflete chair of mineralogy at Oxford, proposes to deliver a course of lectures on "Elementary Crystallography."

AT Girton College, Cambridge, the Gamble prize has been adjudged to Miss Wilmer Cave France, Ph.D., for her essay on "The Relation of the Emperor Julian to the New Sophistic and to Neoplatonism, with a Study of his Sources and Style"; and the Gibson prize, offered for an essay on the following subject: "What Indications are found in the New Testament that the Early Christians were realising a New Ideal of Social Life?" has been adjudged to Miss Mary Hay Wood.

DR. MAX KOCH, who has hitherto held only an extraordinary chair of German Literature at Breslau, has recently been appointed Professor Ordinarius in that subject.

BEREFT.

SLEEP, sweet Spring, in the storms and glooms
Of wintry skies,
Wake not to scatter thy lap of blooms.
Dark be thine eyes!

Sleep entombed in the drifted lea,
On frozen earth,
Nor stir with the old sweet mystery
Of life at birth.

Sleep in the seeds and scaly hoods
Of buds fast sealed,
Sleep for aye in the naked woods,
Die unrevealed.

Die in the firstlings of the flock
And shivering herds;
Blight, upon tree and moor and rock,
The loves of birds.

Sleep with the spawning frog and fish,
In crystal cave;
Loose not, at Nature's ardent wish,
The fettered wave.

Sleep in the unborn Pascal moon
And veil her horn;
Freeze in the bells their holy tune
For Easter morn.

Shroud the sun as he rises fast
To zenith blind,
Darken his day with garment vast
Of cloud and wind.

Sleep, sweet Spring, in the purple gloom
Of the dawning year,
Nor hither come with thy balm and bloom,
Thy smile and tear.

Sleep! she sleeps who with burning brow
Longed sore for thee.
Possess thy soul in her patience now,
And, where she sleeps in the grave, sleep thou, Eternally.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. JOHN OWEN.

IT is with much regret that we record the death of an old and valued contributor to the ACADEMY, the Rev. John Owen, rector of East Anstey, near Dulverton. For some years he had been suffering from a painful illness, which latterly incapacitated him from literary work. At the last, the end came rather suddenly, before his brother, his only surviving relation, could arrive from London. But there were present at his bedside his faithful medical attendant from Barnstaple, and the vicar of the neighbouring parish of West Anstey. After much suffering, he passed away in the evening of Thursday, February 6.

John Owen was born (we have reason to believe) in 1833, at Pembroke, where his father and mother both continued to live to an advanced age. The story of his life is very simple. He was educated at St. David's College, Lampeter, during the time when the Rev. Dr. Rowland Williams was vice-principal there; and he naturally fell under the influence of that strong mind. As soon as he had completed his course, he was appointed by Rowland Williams to lecture on Hebrew as his deputy; and when Rowland Williams accepted the living of Bowerchalke, in Wiltshire, he followed him there, to be his curate for ten years. He contributed a most interesting chapter on the character and teaching of his master to the memorial volume that was published by the widow; and it was a connexion by marriage of the widow—no other, we have heard, than Canon Jessopp—who presented him, in 1870, to the rectory of East Anstey, where the remainder of his life was destined to be spent.

East Anstey is a tiny village, with little more than 200 souls, nestling under the southernmost ridge of Exmoor. Though now easily accessible by railway, it preserves the characteristics of North Devon life in the early years of the century. Here was the home of the prototype of R. D. Blackmore's "Passon Chowne," of whom many traditions still linger. In the churchyard lies Jack Babbage, a name well-known to the followers of the stag-hounds. Witchcraft, both black and white, has hardly yet died out. Secluded amid these rude surroundings, Owen passed twenty-five years of his life, very rarely leaving his comfortable parsonage, and falling back more and more upon the companionship of his books in the absence of congenial society.

No doubt, he first gained his love of books from Rowland Williams; but, as a collector, he far surpassed his master. Every room in the house was crammed with them; and we venture to think that his was the largest collection, of recent years, in the West of England. Nothing in the shape of book, pamphlet, or periodical came amiss to him: he never grudged shelf-room to the least worthy. As might be expected, his library of philosophy and theology was practically complete—in all ages, languages, and departments. He specially prided himself on his noble folios of the Schoolmen, and on his series of the modern Germans. But his interests extended to costly scientific monographs, illustrated quartos of travel, prints by Turner, and even collections of the primitiae of poets and essayists. Mere bibliographical rarities he did not greatly affect; neither did he care much for the most recent verse or fiction. In the main, books were his tools; but, in fine editions, they were also the source to him of cultivated pleasure.

Of all the men we have known, Owen was the most confirmed philosopher. The circumstances of his early education, and of his subsequent life, deprived him of that association with his equals which would probably have made him more a man of the world. Isolation among his loved books drove him into habits of self-communion, and kept him out of touch even with the reading public. Full as his mind was of all kinds of learning, he was little able to impart it to others. Nearly all of his published work was devoted to enforcing the duty of suspense of judgment, as opposed to dogmatism, in theology and philosophy alike—Skepticism, as he liked to spell it; and yet we have read, in an obituary notice, that he "was author of several books written to combat various aspects of unbelief." His comparative failure to reach the public was, undoubtedly, a disappointment to himself; but he bore it with philosophic calm. It gave him pleasure when Archdeacon Farrar invited him to preach at Westminster, and again when the authorities of Manchester College asked him, though an Anglican clergyman, to open their second session at Oxford. But it will always remain a cause of regret to his friends that none of the Scottish universities were discerning enough to appoint him a lecturer on the Gifford foundation. Dealing on a large scale with the subject of Natural Religion, he would have found full scope for his powers, and left behind him a worthy memorial.

Apart from his contribution to the Life of Rowland Williams, his earliest book, and his best, was Evenings with the Skeptics (2 vols., 1881). Here, in the literary form of dialogue, he expressed not only his own views on "free thought," as exemplified in the Greek and early Christian period, but also the different appeal which it makes to different minds. It was not till more than ten years later that he found encouragement to continue this work with The Skeptics of the Italian Renaissance (1892)—which is notable for its sympathetic estimate of Giordano Bruno—and The Skeptics of the French Renaissance (1893). Both of these books, it should be added, are enriched with an elaborate index, due to the personal enthusiasm of his publisher. Previously, in 1885, he had edited—with much enjoyment in the task—Glanvill's Sceptics Scientifica for the "Parchment Library"; and a little volume of Verse Musings—philosophic rather than poetical—passed into a second edition. He also published a paper on "The Religious Aspects of Skepticism"—originally delivered as a lecture at South-place Chapel—in the second edition of a volume entitled Religious Systems of the World (1893); and we believe that the very last work that he was able to undertake was to fill Pater's place in lecturing upon Pascal at the Oxford Summer Meeting in 1894.

So long as his health permitted, he wrote frequently in the ACADEMY. He was also a regular contributor for many years to the Edinburgh Review, often on subjects that showed his great versatility. We happen to know that his work was highly valued by the late Dr. Reeve, with whose general views he was much in sympathy. Some of these Edinburgh articles might possibly be worth republication. Doubtless, also, he left much behind him in MS.: indeed, we have heard him talk of a collection of Exmoor legends.

J. S. C.

THE death is also announced of Dr. Peter Bayne, a hard-working author and journalist, whose life-long industry scarcely met with the reward that it deserved. His best-known books are his Life of Hugh Miller (whom he succeeded as editor of the Witness) and his History of the Free Kirk. He was found dead in his bed, from failure of the heart's action, on the morning of February 11. He is to be buried on Saturday, in the churchyard of Harlington, where his first and second wives both lie. One of his sons is the present vicar of St. Jude's, Whitechapel.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

MR. H. S. COWPER'S paper in the Antiquary on the Megalithic Temples of Tripoli, though only a sketch, is a very useful contribution to our knowledge of an obscure subject. Fergusson's "Rude Stone Monuments," a work published nearly a quarter of a century ago, caused a revolution in popular opinion, whatever may have been the case among experts. We trust the researches of Mr. Cowper and others such as he may lead to a definitive settlement of various questions connected with these ancient structures. Mr. Hailstone's paper on the Hundreds of Cambridgeshire is a careful study. We hope it may lead others to endeavour to work out this interesting subject. So far as we are aware, no list of Hundreds, Wapentakes and Shires has yet been given to the world in alphabetical sequence. In some counties—Lincolnshire for example—the Domesday Wapentakes are far more numerous than those now recognised. Dr. Fowler's "Account Book of William Wray," a Ripon shopkeeper of the days of Elizabeth, promises to be of much interest; at present we have only a small portion of it before us. The identification of the persons mentioned shows a knowledge of the family history of the neighbourhood which many of his readers will envy. Nicknames have always been common, but we should not have expected to find them in the staid pages of an account-book. So it is, however. "Long Tom" seems to have been a commercial traveller from whom Mr. Wray purchased durraunce and other articles. Can he be identified, we wonder? He may have been a Leeds man.

THE "TALE OF WADE."

WE have to congratulate Dr. James of King's College, Cambridge, and Mr. Gollancz of Christ's, on their discovery of a fragment of the long lost Early-English "Tale of Wade," which Chaucer makes Pandarus tell Oriseyde after their supper together at his house, before he brings Troilus to her. Spaght no doubt saw the MS. about 1600, for he says the story was long and fabulous; but since then nothing has been heard of the original. Dr. James, however, while making a catalogue of the MSS. at Peterhouse, came across a short English quotation in an early thirteenth century Latin homily on Humility, and asked Mr. Gollancz to interpret it to him. Mr. Gollancz, to his great joy, found that it was six lines of the lost "Tale of Wade," and mentioned Wade's father, the giant Hildebrand, who begat him on a mermaid. The preacher was speaking of the Fall of man, and the evil that followed from it. He said that Adam was turned from a man into a sort of non-man; and not Adam only, but almost all other men too; so that they could say with Wade, "Some are elves and some are adders; some are sprites that dwell by waters: there is no Man, but Hildebrand only."

"Adam autem, de homine, factus est quasi non homo; nec tantum Adam, sed omnes rere sunt quasi non homines. Ita quod dicere possunt cum Wade:

"Summe sende ylues and summe sende nadderres:
summe sende nikeres
the [bi den waters] wunien:
Nister man nenne
bute ildebrand onne."

The two difficult words are biden pater or pater in l. 4. Mr. Gollancz at first emended them, from Layamon, into binnen poles, "in pools"; but as that sacrifices the alliteration, Mr. Liddell suggested bi ðen watere, "by the waters," as the scribe might easily mistake the Anglo-Saxon w (p) for a p, and the long final r with an e twirl for z. Mr. Bradley suggested wades, "fords."

The "Tale of Wade" must then be much like Layamon's Brut, and date about 1300 A.D. Its alliteration, though constant, is not regular.

The discovery of this fragment is of the highest interest to all students of our language, literature, and mythology. It now remains for Dr. James and Mr. Gollancz to find the rest of the poem, and tell us all about Wade's magic boat, "Guingelot," and his wondrous adventures in it; about his mermaid mother, his smith-son Weyland, and his grandson Withga. Like Oliver Twist, we ask for more.

London: Feb. 10, 1896.

At last Friday's meeting of the Philological Society, Mr. Israel Gollancz communicated and explained the historical "Tale of Wade" just recovered by him. I arrived too late to profit by his paper, but having been favoured with a printed copy of the text I was enabled to study it at home. I therefore venture to suggest some explanations of the few Latin lines introducing the Song. I reproduce them here as given by Mr. Gollancz, the italics denoting his conjectural additions.

"Adam autem de homine factus est quod non homo nec tantum Adam sed omnes rere sunt quod non homines. Ita quod dicere possunt cum Wade."

For this surely meaningless version I propose the following reading:

"Adam a deo est factus, quo nominatur homo nec tantum Adam sed omnes fuerunt et sunt, qui nominantur homines. Itaque dicere possunt [ponsum] cum Wade."

CORRESPONDENCE.

ON INFANT BAPTISM AND FOLKLORE.

London: Jan. 30, 1896.

Biblical scholars are, I believe, agreed on the source and original meaning of adult Christian baptism. It derives from a rite practised by the Jews in the introduction of proselytes, and greatly extended by St. John the Baptist: it means an initiation into the Christian mysteries, which implies, of course, previous instruction; and it dates from the time of the Apostles. But there is no such consensus as to the origin and signification of infant baptism. All that seems certain about this rite is that it was taken into the Christian system towards the end of the second century, and that down to the fourth it had decided adversaries* of whom Tertullian was the chief. His words (De baptismo, c. 18) are as follows:

"Itaque pro cuiusque personae conditione ac dispositione, etiam aetate cunctatio baptismi utilior est, praecipue tamen circa parvulos. Quid enim necesse est, sponsores etiam periculo ingeri, qui et ipsi per mortalitatem destinare promissiones suas possunt et proventus malae indolis falli? At quidem Dominus: 'Nolite illos prohibere ad me venire.' Veniant ergo, dum adolescent; veniant, dum discunt, dum quo veniant doceantur; sicut Christiani, quum Christum nosse potuerint. Quid festinat innocens aetas ad remissionem peccatorum? Cautius agetur in saecularibus, ut cui substantia terrena non creditur, divina credatur! Norint petere salutem, ut 'petenti' dedisse videaris."†

It is impossible to believe that the writer of this passage could have regarded the parvulorum baptismum as having apostolic sanction.

I suggest, with the deference becoming one who is not a professional theologian, that the source of Christian infant baptism, like the source of Christian parthenogenesis, demonology, plurality of heavens, &c., is to be found in folk-lore, and that this kind of baptism was originally a pagan rite of purification, which at first, perhaps, included the mother as well as the child. In addition to the cases mentioned by Prof. Tylor in his Primitive Culture (3rd ed., vol. ii., pp. 430-433), I find evidence that such a rite existed among the heathen Norsemen, the heathen Celts, two unconverted West African tribes, and, lastly, the Mexicans before the arrival of the Spaniards.

Proofs that the heathen Norsemen practised a kind of infant baptism must be familiar to all who have read translations of the Heimskringla and the Egilssaga, and are too numerous to be here quoted.

"Ausa vatni [says Vigfusson] is a standing phrase for a sort of baptism used in the last centuries, at least, of the heathen age. The child when born was sprinkled with water and named, yet without the intervention of a priest. This rite is mentioned as early as in the Hávamál, one of the very oldest mythological didactic poems on record, where it is attributed even to Odin."‡

See the Icelandic-English Dictionary, s.v. ausa, where many of the instances in Old-Norse literature are cited or referred to.

In that vast, but almost unexplored, treasury of folk-lore, the romantic literature of the medieval Irish, I have found the following four references to heathen baptism. First, in the Voyage of the Húi Corru (Revue Celtique, xiv. 28), after relating how their mother bore them—one at nightfall, one at midnight, and one at daybreak—the story proceeds thus:

"ocus robaisteadh doréir an bhaisteadh geintilidhe iad, 7 ba hiald so a n-anmanna, Lochán 7 Éinne 7 Siluester."

"and they were baptized according to the heathen baptism, and these were their names: Lochán, and Énde, and Silvester."

Secondly, in the Cóir Anmann (H. 3. 18, p. 392*), an edition of which is about to appear at Leipzig, in part 2, ser. 3, of the Irische Texte, we find:

"Táinic inbaid na hingine 7 rofug mac. Tanga-dar drúidh buidaidhe in maic i ngeintliucht, gur chanaist an mbaithis ngeintlidhe for in mac mbeg, 7 rofúidhailt: Ní ghinfi mac bhus ingaire oldás in mac so do Connachtaibh, 7 ní bhia* aldhi gin chenn Connachtaigh for a chrías, 7 mairbhfidh fer for leth Connacht."

"The damsel's time arrived, and she bore a son. Druids came to baptise the boy into heathenism, and they chanted the heathen baptism over the little child, and they said: 'Never shall be born a boy who will be more impious than this boy towards the Connaughtmen; and not a night will he be without a Connaughtman's head on his girdle, and he will kill more than half of the men of Connaught.'"

Cet Mac Magach, the boy's maternal uncle, then gives him the name of Connall, and he grows up to be the famous hero, Connall Cernach.

Thirdly, in the Wooing of Monera (ed. O'Curry, p. 164):

"acus gabais docta hidan acus lamanda [leg. lamnada] in ingen, acus ruc mac sainemall; acus adrubairt in druid: bid oll ndalle dobera ar na críochaib uimne. Acus ro baistea a rothaibh druidechta, 7 tucad Ailill fair."

Thus rendered by O'Curry:

"and pangs of labour and parturition seized upon the princess; and she brought forth a beautiful son, and the Druid said: 'Great will be the fame of his exploits through the countries around him.' And he was baptised in iridic streams,† and [the name of] Ailill was given to him."

Fourthly, in the unpublished story of The Birth of Brandub and Eogan,‡ Rawl. B. 502 (a twelfth-century MS. in the Bodleian), fol. 47* 2, two queens are brought to bed at the same time, one has twin sons, the other twin daughters: one exchanges a son for a daughter, the other a daughter for a son. The tale proceeds thus:

"Baistitair na maic arthus 7 in da ingen iarum. Ocus atbert in drui triasín mbaithes: 'Na bad nar libal, a mná, hit emuin in da mac so 7 in hemuin in di ingen,' 7 dobert Aed 7 Brandub foraib."

"The boys are baptised first and the two girls afterwards. And at the baptism the druid said: 'Have no shame, O ladies, these two boys are twins and the two girls are twins.' And he bestowed [the names] Aed and Brandub upon them."

It will have been observed that in all these Irish cases the naming of the child is associated with its ceremonial cleansing. So in the case of the Roman lustration of infants:

"est autem dies lustricus, quo infantes lustrantur et nomen accipiunt, sed is maribus nonus, octavus est feminis" (Macrobius Saturnalia, ed. Zeunius, p. 291).

A trace of the existence of infant baptism among the heathen Britons is (as Prof. Rhys was the first to notice §) found in the Mabinogi of Pwyll, Prince of Dyfed, where Teyrnion and his wife cause the babe that comes to them miraculously to be baptised with the baptism that was usual at that time ("peri a wnaethant beddydya y mab or beddyd awneit yna").

That the heathen Aztecs practised infant baptism is so well known that I will content myself with referring to Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico, vol. i., p. 57; vol. ii., p. 482, and quoting the following passage:

"After a solemn invocation the head and lips of the infant were touched with water, and a name was given to it, while the goddess Chicocatl, who presided over childbirth, was implored that the sin which was given to us before the beginning of the world might not visit the child, but that cleansed by these waters it might live and be born anew."*

* MS. bhiadh.

‡ There is a précis of it in O'Mahony's translation of Keating's History of Ireland, pp. 392, 393. It is omitted in d'Arbois de Jubainville's Essai d'un Catalogue de la littérature épique de l'Irlande.

§ Hibbert Lectures, 1886, pp. 499, 500.

To Mr. Tylor's three instances of infant baptism by African heathens, I can add the following from the late Col. Ellis's books on the Slave Coast:

"Seven days after birth, if the child be a girl; nine days, if it be a boy . . . follows a ceremony which appears to be one of purification, for here as among the Tshi and Ewe tribes, the mother, and child are considered unclean, as are women during the menses. The water which is always in the earthen vessels placed before the images of the gods is brought to the house and thrown up on the thatched roof, and as it drips down from the eaves, the mother and child pass three times through the falling drops. The babalawo next makes a water of purification, with which he bathes the child's head; he repeats three times the name by which the infant is to be known, and then holds him in his arms so that his feet touch the ground."—The Yoruba-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast of West Africa (London, 1894, p. 153).

"It is the priest who here names the child, not the father, as is the case on the Gold Coast—a new departure which marks the increased power of the priesthood and their disposition to control and interfere in all the principal events of life. The name-giving is also combined with the purification of the new-born child—the priest bathing its forehead with water, and repeating three times the name it is to bear, while on the Gold Coast there is no connexion between the two ceremonies."—The Ewe-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast of West Africa (p. 154).

From the instances collected by Prof. Tylor, and those set forth in the present paper, it is certain that the ceremonial cleansing of newborn children existed among pagan races in many different parts of the world, and it may fairly be inferred that some such rite was found among all the pagan races with which the early Christians came in contact. From one or more of these races (but which?) it is probable that the Christians of the second century borrowed the practice of infant baptism, spiritualising the rite so as to adapt it to the doctrines of original sin and regeneration.

WHITLEY STOKES.

AN UNRECORDED ENGLISH VERB.

Oxford: Jan. 26, 1894.

In Thorpe's edition of the Homilies of Ælfric (vol. ii., p. 260) it is said, "And hi bewundon his lic mid linenre-scytan gedéced mid wyrmtum" ("and they bewound his corpse with a linen sheet, 'deched' with spices"). The same verb occurs in Cockayne's Anglo-Saxon Leechdoms (vol. i. 182): "Cnuc mid ryale, and gedec anne clað þær mid, and gewrit to ðam sare" ("pound it with lard and 'deche' a cloth therewith, and bind it to the sore"). At p. 150 we have the simple verb without the ge: "cnuca tosomne on wine, dec þonne anne clað þær of, lege to ðam sare" ("pound together in wine, 'deche' then a cloth therewith and lay to the sore"). In both places Cockayne translates "cover," apparently through some hasty and inconsiderate association with deck, a Low-German word of late adoption in English, to which our cognate word is thetch. Bosworth-Toller accepts this translation, and enters the verbs as deccan, gedeccan "to cover," with cross-references to peccan, gepeccan "to 'thetch,' cover." Form, meaning, and cross-reference are erroneous; the e is actually accented as long in the MSS. and printed editions in two places; and the past participle gedéced could not belong to a verb deccan. The reference to gepeccan is actually to a quotation for its past tense geþeahste; if the verb had been gedeccan, of * These references to original sin and regeneration are probably due to some Spanish ecclesiastic.

* See Renan, Marc-Aurèle, p. 528. He expressly refers to Tertullian, and impliedly to Gregory of Nazianzus.

† The allusion is to Luke vi. 30.

‡ The passage referred to is thus translated in the Corpus Poeticum Boreale (i. 27): "If I sprinkle water on a young lord, he shall never fall, though he go to battle, he will be proof against the swords." But this does not seem to refer to the baptism of an infant—rather, perhaps, to a second sprinkling, such as was (or is?) performed in New Zealand to admit a lad into the rank of warriors. (See Tylor, Primitive Culture, ii., p. 431.)

course its past participle would similarly have been gedaht. The sense is suggested by a parallel passage in the next paragraph, on p. 182, in the Leechdoms: "smyre þonne anne clað þær mid, lege to þære miltan" ("smear then a cloth therewith, lay to the spleen"). Instead of "deccan, gedeccan, to cover," Bosworth-Toller ought to read "dēcan, gedēcan, to smear, daub, plaster with something sticky." Of an Old-English dēcan, the Middle-English form would be dēche, its modern form deech. The Middle-English form, though not recorded by Mätzner or Stratmann, occurs twice in the English metrical version of Palladius on Husbandry, made about 1440 (Early English Text Society). At p. 41 remedies for chinks in baths are described, a recipe is given of several ingredients, and it is said that "al thees comixt wol deche Every defaute, and all the woundes leche." At p. 177 the question is of cementing the joints of clay pipes for conduits: "Oil-tempred lyme this joyntes shal seymet, Thenne yeels myxt with littl water renne Thorough, deching alle this hoolom instrument." Here we have, riming with lēche "leech," dēche "to daub, plaster," though the compiler of the Glossarial Index, with lofty contempt of such trifles as vowels and consonants, says, "Deche, to cover, German decken." It is an interesting example of how words may live on, with very rare emergence in extant literature, that we should know this word only at two dates separated by some 450 years, near the close of the Old-English and of the Middle-English periods respectively. It suggests that deech may again crop up 450 years later still, in some modern English dialect, if only our knowledge of these were more complete, or the long-wished-for English Dialect Dictionary realised. Has Old-English dēcan, of which the Germanic type would be dōkan, any cognates outside Germanic? Greek θήνη (thēnē) answers in form, but not in sense, so far as I can see.

Feb. 7, 1896.

The above was written by me for the ACADEMY two years ago, but through some oversight was mislaid and never sent. As it has again turned up, I venture now to send it, because I have to add an interesting epilogue. I ventured to suggest that deech might yet turn up in some existing English dialect, although a search through Halliwell and the publications of the Dialect Society had disclosed no trace of it. I had not, however, considered all possible phonetic changes. The verb actually exists in the form ditch. Thus Halliwell has (absurdly united with "ditch, a fence, not the drain") "Ditch, grimy dirt. Also, to stick to, as anything that is clammy." The latter is evidently taken from Marshall's Rural Economy of the Midland Counties (1790), the Glossary to which (reprinted in E. D. S., B5) has "ditch, to stick to, as the clamminess of mow-burnt hay sticks to the cutting-knife." The Leicester Glossary, by Evans, has the word both as substantive and verb, the latter exemplified by "The touch-ole wer reg'lar ditched up." I have also a quotation from Northamptonshire about 1860: "His face and hands were ditched with dirt"; and I find the word in Miss Baker's Northamptonshire Glossary (1854), illustrated by such phrases as "Your skin is so ditched, it'll never come clean again"; "How your hands be ditched!" &c. Finally, Messrs. Besant and Rice, in Ready-Money Mortiboy (ch. xxi.), give the word literary currency, in "Smearing his coarse hands with spirits to get off the dirt with which they were ditched." The modern change of deech to ditch is of course the same as the change of breeches to britches (concoined by non-phonetic spelling). Thus, the suggestion that dēcan, which, after being out of sight for 450 years, had suddenly "popped up" about 1450 as deche, might possibly, after another disappearance of 450 years, turn up in some modern dialect, has been singularly realised. And if we had not the Palladius, or if that work were still unprinted, both of which might easily be, the blank interval between Old-English dēcan and modern ditch would be 900 years, and the word in living use all the while! There are probably many words in the same position, and such a striking instance as that of dēcan, dēche, ditch shows us that this is a possibility always to be contemplated. As I knew nothing of ditch two years ago, I entered the word in the Dictionary under its Middle-English form DECHE; I have now to supplement that by an article, DITCH v., referring back to DECHE.

One word more. Two years ago I wrote about "the long-wished-for Dialect Dictionary" as still only a wish. Through Prof. Wright's splendid effort, that is also, we hope, about to be realised, if only he secures the help needed to enable him to carry out his work on the lines on which it has been projected.

SCIENCE.

MATHEMATICAL BOOKS.

An Introduction to the Algebra of Quantics. By E. B. Elliott. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) In 1859 appeared Dr. Salmon's Lessons Introductory to the Modern Higher Algebra, which, the author tells us, grew out of lectures given to his class to supply the members of it with information necessary to enable them to read the original memoirs of Cayley and Sylvester with advantage. These "Lessons" culminated in a much larger treatise, published in 1876. No similar work has since been printed, we believe, in English; and as in the meantime the subject has been growing with the additions of—to name a few only—contributions by Macmahon, Kempe, Hammond, and our author, the appearance of the thoroughly up-to-date book before us is most acceptable. Its genesis is very similar to that of the "Lessons"; for it is an expansion of Prof. Elliott's annual course of lectures, and its primary object is to explain with all the clearness at his command the leading principles of Invariant Algebra, in the hope of making it evident to junior students that the subject is attractive as well as important. Prof. Elliott has aimed at lucidity, and so has avoided compression; the result is a piece of work which will gain him the thanks of his readers. To begin with, his choice of a title strikes us as being especially happy; for it brings into prominence those memoirs of the late Prof. Cayley which are so closely associated with the Algebra of Invariants and Covariants. The most cursory examination puts in evidence the care and conscientiousness with which Prof. Elliott has studied and reproduced the original memoirs, and has endeavoured to assign to each discoverer his due. His own contributions to societies and to journals are of a high order, and play an important part in the present text-book. The full index brings to light many a name which does not figure in the earlier work—such as Alternants, Annihilators, Anti-Seminvariants, Perpetuants, and Protomorphs. Of each of these an account is given, and numerous examples bring out their significance. The principles are first discussed, and then come two chapters on the essential qualities of Invariants and Covariants. The treatment is to some extent novel. The next four chapters take up Cogredient and Contragredient Quantities, Binary Quantics, wherein Invariants and Covariants, &c., are treated as functions of differences, and their Annihilators considered and fully illustrated. Then Seminvariants, the further treatment of the theory of the Annihilators and of the law of Reciprocity, close this division. Many of the above matters are subsequently discussed in further detail; and then follow chapters on Generating Functions, Protomorphs, Canonical Forms, the Invariants and Covariants of the Binary Quintics and Sextics, and a concluding chapter on Ternary Quantics. We have already alluded to the examples dispersed over the text and to the excellent index. There may be misprints, but we believe these will only crop up on a diligent use of the book.

A Primer of the History of Mathematics. By W. W. Rouse Ball. (Macmillan.) Mr. Ball states his object to be to give a popular account of the history of mathematics, including therein some notice of the lives and surroundings of those to whom its development is mainly due, as well as of their discoveries. This Primer is written in the agreeable style with which the author has made us acquainted in his previous essays; and we are sure that all readers of it will be ready to say that Mr. Ball has succeeded in the hope he has formed, that "it may not be uninteresting" even to those who are unacquainted with the leading facts. It is just the book to give to an intelligent young student, and should allure him on to the perusal of Mr. Ball's "Short Account." The present work is not a mere réchauffé of that, though naturally most of what is here given will be found in equivalent form in the larger work. After the Introduction we have mathematics under Greek influence, in the Middle Ages, during the Renaissance, then the introduction of modern analysis, and, finally, recent mathematics. The choice of material appears to us to be such as should lend interest to the study of mathematics and increase its educational value, which has been the author's aim. The book goes well into the pocket, and is excellently printed. The only clerical errors we have detected are two on p. 7, and the figure on p. 43 is not correctly drawn. A line or two might have been given to Menelaus and Ceva, as most schoolboys are acquainted with the theorems which go by their names; the latter was not mentioned in the "Short Account" (1888).

American Journal of Mathematics. Vol. XVII. 4. (Baltimore.) A long paper on "The Deformation of Thin Elastic Wires," by Mr. A. B. Basset, discusses inter alia the theory of small deformations, which is founded upon an hypothesis of the author; criticises unfavourably St. Venant's theory of the torsion of prisms; and, after correcting an error in a paper printed elsewhere (Proc. Lond. Math. Soc., vol. xxiii.), enunciates two fundamental theorems. The author then attacks the theory of finite deformations as stated by Mr. Love in his second volume (Elasticity, pp. 93, 157), and subsequently considers the equilibrium of naturally straight wires. The stability of a deformed elastic wire is next investigated by three methods; and then three special cases of the stability of a straight wire subjected to thrust, and also the three cases when the wire is subjected to both thrust and twist, are discussed at length. Other points of interest are also investigated. Mr. Basset, while commending Mr. Love's geometrical work, does not look upon his treatment of the physical portion of the subject as being at all so satisfactory. Prof. E. W. Brown's "Investigations in the Lunar Theory" is an outline of a plan for the development of the expressions which represent the co-ordinates of the moon, together with certain theorems connected with the infinite determinants which determine certain motions of perigee and node, and, in addition, some results concerning the constant part of the expression which gives the parallax of the moon. Like former papers by this author, this memoir has met with high approval from astronomers in this country as well as in America. The closing paper is by Otto Staudé, and is entitled "Ueber den Sinn der Windung in den singulären Punkten einer Raumcurve." It is, to some extent, an expansion of results given in a memoir by Kueser in Crelle (Bd. 113), and is illustrated with numerous figures.

OBITUARY.

DR. REINHOLD ROST, C.I.E.

DR. ROST has not long survived his retirement from the India Office. He died, very suddenly, on February 7, at Canterbury, whither he had gone on duties connected with St. Augustine's College. He had just completed the seventy-fourth year of his age.

Reinhold Rost was born in 1822 at a little manufacturing town in the duchy of Saxe-Altenberg, where his father was a Lutheran minister, holding the office of Arch-deacon. After being educated at the Gymnasium in the capital of his native state, he proceeded to the neighbouring University of Jena, where he graduated as Ph.D. in 1847. Having already determined to devote himself to oriental studies, he came at once to England, the great storehouse of Sanskrit MSS. His first post was that of oriental lecturer at the missionary college at Canterbury, with which he remained associated till the last. For a short time he acted as secretary to the Royal Asiatic Society; and in 1869 he was nominated librarian to the India Office, in succession to Dr. Fitzedward Hall, who survives him. This is one of the few posts in England that may be regarded as an endowment for oriental research. The official duties are not heavy; but the collection of MSS. is one of the largest in the world, and their custodian is necessarily brought into contact with students of all countries. In addition, he acts as adviser in philological matters to the Secretary of State for India, who still dispenses some of that literary patronage in which the old Company was so profuse.

Dr. Rost will long be remembered as the ideal librarian to the India Office. If he left it to others to catalogue and edit the MSS, this was not through incapacity for either task, but because he thought himself better employed in placing his materials and his knowledge at their disposal. Though primarily a Sanskritist, he had to consider the claims of Arabic and Persian, of Pali, Burmese, and Sinhalese, of Tibetan and Malay, and of countless vernaculars. Of all those languages we have mentioned, he possessed a competent knowledge; and he had further to give his attention to questions relating to archaeology, ethnology, and Indian history. In brief, Dr. Rost elected to turn himself into an oriental encyclopaedia, which no one ever consulted in vain. Through his initiative, MSS. were lent freely to foreign scholars; and it is hardly too much to say that on the continent he was regarded as the steward of oriental knowledge in England, to whom every one appealed for assistance and advice. This feeling was strongly expressed in a testimonial presented to him in 1892, when it was rumoured that he was to be retired compulsorily from his post. Frenchmen joined with Germans in testifying to the kindness and impartiality which he had always displayed towards fellow-students. The Government allowed him one year more of office, and of work; but he was superannuated—sorely against the grain—in 1893.

Dr. Rost wrote little under his own name. His first publication was, we believe, an essay on the Hindu sources of Burmese law (1850), and he also compiled a catalogue of the palm-leaf MSS. in the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. He was content to be known as the editor of H. H. Wilson's Selected Works, of Brian Hodgson's Collected Papers, and of four volumes of Miscellanies relating to Indo-China. In conjunction with Nicholas Trübner, he planned and edited a series of "Simplified Grammars"; and for some time he conducted Trübner's Oriental Record, now continued by Luzac & Co. But his modesty did not deprive him of all public recognition. Edinburgh made him LL.D., and Oxford conferred on him the rarer distinction of honorary M.A. He was an honorary or corresponding member of many learned societies, on the continent and in the East. Prussia, Russia, and Sweden gave him decorations; and our own Government appointed him Companion of the Indian Empire in 1888.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE RESTORED PRONUNCIATION OF GREEK AND LATIN."

Bangor } Feb. 4, 1896.
Cardiff }

We regret that we have been prevented from replying sooner to the letter of Dr. R. J. Lloyd in the ACADEMY of January 11. The writer somewhat severely censures us for being

"cocksure" of our theories, and for attempting alone a task which can only be satisfactorily accomplished by "international agreement"; he thinks we have failed to adopt a reasonable "eclecticism" in our practical recommendations, finds "grave errors" in our "phonetic explanations," and demurs to our adopting as the standard of Greek pronunciation that of the age of Pericles.

We readily welcome that part of Dr. Lloyd's letter which deals with matters of practical interest, and can only regret that the writer, who appears to desire reform not less than ourselves, should put forward in so exaggerated a manner the points on which he differs from us. His general criticisms may be very briefly dealt with. We are not aware that there are so great discrepancies of opinion as to Greek pronunciation as he suggests between the views of the authorities to which we refer—Brugmann and Gustav Meyer in the first instance, and then Blass, and we may add Meisterhans; but it is open to Dr. Lloyd, if he will do so, to name others whom he regards as "the highest authorities." For such differences as exist, we think we have made allowance in our statement, that "the margin of doubt, though from the scientific point of view it is considerable, is nevertheless, when seen from the standpoint of the practical teacher, confined within very narrow limits."

An "international agreement" upon these matters is perhaps to be desired; more probably it would be an evil. We have not concerned ourselves with such great things. A practical question, is forced upon us by circumstances; and we are content that the solution we propose should at least be in the direction of international approximation. Nor do we see any prospect of further approximation except upon the rational scientific basis upon which we have so far proceeded.

We cannot admit that Dr. Lloyd is right in thinking that we ought to have made more concessions to the idiosyncrasies of English school-boys. In the first place, the average "English school-boy" objects to a reformed pronunciation upon principle, and in toto, just as he objects to acquiring the characteristic sounds of a modern language; and we do not exactly admit his right to stand in the way of any other school-boys in England or Wales who are more willing to learn. Secondly, our pamphlet allows a very ample discretion to the schoolmaster to postpone all reforms which he believes would interfere with the practical progress of his class.

In the "phonetic explanations" which are criticised, we have endeavoured in a few pages to assist the teacher to realise the exact meaning of the changes we suggest, and to explain them to his pupils. In this we are not shown to have failed. One "grave error" when approached resolves itself into a "cumbersome wording"; others have to do with the precise force of certain technical terms, in a subject in which English writers are still far from having reached an accepted terminology; one is a mere obiter dictum which might have been worded more correctly. No one of the "errors" referred to is practically misleading, but we can promise Dr. Lloyd full attention to his criticisms in any re-issue of the pamphlet.

Passing to more definite issues, we notice with satisfaction that Dr. Lloyd raises none with regard to Latin: an indication of the very general agreement that now exists with regard to Latin pronunciation. With regard to Greek, Dr. Lloyd opposes our recommendations as to the treatment of the vowel group, of which the most important members are ε, η, ι; and to this point we in turn invite the attention of your readers. We understand our critic to make two assertions.

1. That it is a mistake from the teacher's standpoint to adopt the pronunciation of Pericles rather than that of Demoethenes; and this for the reason—

2. That in the later period η and ε had become identical save in quantity.

1. Let us assume for the moment the truth of Dr. Lloyd's second assertion; then it would appear to us that in this point the "tutorial" advantage lies emphatically on the side of the Periclean pronunciation. It is throwing dust in the eyes of the non-technical reader to talk of the distinction in quality between η and ε, which naturally seems to be of no practical value, seeing that they are distinguished by quantity in any case. The practical question is: Shall we choose a pronunciation which completely confounds η and ε, or one which gives them such a distinction as every Scotch and English child learns to make if he learns to pronounce French at all, and such, we may add, as every Welsh child acquires by right of birth? That in the time of Pericles ε was equivalent to a lengthened ε and represented a long close ε, while η was a long open ε, is a commonplace of Attic grammar. It is something to banish the barbarous "English" confusion of ε and η; but why need we forfeit half our practical gain by introducing a new confusion between ε and η, even assuming that such a confusion existed at Athens in the time of Demoethenes? This brings us to the second point.

2. So far as we are acquainted with the evidence, "Hellenic, epigraphic, phonetic," and, we may add, transcriptional, we know of none to justify Dr. Lloyd's statement that η and ε were identical in quality at Athens in the time of Demoethenes. He will certainly not find it in any of the standard authorities on Greek phonology, Brugmann, Gustav Meyer, or Meisterhans; and the most recent attempts to improve on their doctrines made by advocates of the modern Greek pronunciation, whether in England or Germany, are hardly encouraging. It may be, however, that Dr. Lloyd is referring to the change of the diphthong ηι, which, it is hardly necessary to point out, is quite a different matter from the simple vowel η. The fact that in the time of Demoethenes η followed by ι had become a close ε, so that the common endings -η and -αι, -ης, and -ων were respectively identical in pronunciation, while in the time of Pericles they were distinct, was one of the points that made us prefer the earlier epoch; but, so far as we can judge, the evidence that in Athens, even in 300 B.C., η was sounded differently from ε, ης from ες is remarkably clear and decisive. If so, it is surely of some "tutorial" importance to maintain the distinction; if, on the other hand, Dr. Lloyd has new evidence to bring, by all means let him bring it.

SCIENCE NOTES.

On Saturday next Lord Rayleigh will begin a course of lectures at the Royal Institution on "Light." The subject of the evening discourse on Friday will be "The Past, Present, and Future Water Supply of London," by Dr. E. Frankland.

At the Society of Arts, on Monday next, Prof. J. M. Thompson will begin a course of Cantor Lectures on "The Chemistry of Certain Metals and their Compounds used in Building, and the Changes produced in them by Air, Moisture, and Noxious Gases."

* Whether this ε was followed or not by a -y sound, as in Eng. day, is a separate matter, of little practical importance. We follow Brugmann in thinking it was not.

ARRANGEMENTS are now complete for lighting in the evening the Southern Galleries of the South Kensington Museum, on the west side of Exhibition-road, which contain the collections of machinery and naval models. These galleries will be open free to the public from February 17 on three evenings a week—Mondays, Tuesdays, and Saturdays—till 10 p.m., in the same manner as the main building.

We quote the following letter, addressed by Sir W. H. Flower, on behalf of the Trustees of the British Museum, to Mrs. Henry Seebohm:

"I have submitted to the Trustees of the British Museum a report of the receipt from you, through Messrs. Waterhouse, Winterbotham, Harrison, and Harper, of the collection of birds which has been bequeathed to the Trustees by your husband, the late Mr. Henry Seebohm.

"The collection is found to contain about 16,950 specimens, including 235 skeletons, and in extent and scientific value it is one of the most important that the British Museum has ever received. The fact that many of the specimens are types and form the material upon which much of Mr. Seebohm's ornithological investigations and work are founded, must greatly enhance the interest and value of the bequest. Besides the types in the collection, and a large series from localities hitherto unrepresented in the Museum, there are many specimens with historical associations attached to them, such as Swinhoe's Chinese birds; Pryer's Japanese birds; Anderson's Indian birds; a nearly perfect set of the birds of Mount Kina Balu; and the invaluable series obtained by Mr. Seebohm himself in the Petchora and Yen-e-sai Valleys.

"In thus informing you of the importance of the bequest, I have to express to you the high appreciation of the Trustees of the value of your late husband's labours in the cause of ornithological science, the results of which have contributed so largely to our knowledge of the subject; and at the same time to assure you of their deep sense of the loss which the British Museum has sustained by the death of one of its great benefactors.

"I am also to convey to you the expression of the special thanks of the Trustees for the trouble which you have been so good as to take in forwarding the collection in its entirety to the Natural History Museum."

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ARISTOTELIAN.—(Monday, February 3.)

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON, Esq., vice-president, in the chair.—Dr. R. M. Wenley and Miss M. Murray were elected members.—A paper was read by Mrs. Sophie Bryant on "Prof. James's Theory of the Emotions." The theory of Prof. James, that emotion is the feeling of the bodily changes which occur in the instinctive reaction of the physical organism on the perception of the object which excites the emotion, was adversely criticised. The more violent emotions of grief, fear, anguish, which are the natural strongholds of this theory, were first examined, with a view to showing, by appeal to introspective experience, that, although these do normally flow over into, and complete themselves by, a considerable wave of sensational effects, the central emotion can be distinguished from these effects, and does not wax and wane with them. Proceeding to the subtler emotions of imagination and reason, it was submitted that, if there can be found in any of these a well-marked emotional state from which conscious bodily reactions are normally absent, the theory, as a theory of emotion generally, is fatally shaken, since it turns upon the assertion that "if we fancy some strong emotion, and then try to abstract from it all the feelings of its bodily symptoms, we find we have nothing left behind, no 'mind stuff,' out of which the emotion can be constituted, and that a cold and neutral state of perception is all that remains." The emotion of beauty was suggested as a typical instance, and stress laid on the bodily stillness and immunity from sensational disturbance characteristic of the rapt admiration in the presence of beautiful scenes which is one variety of this emotion.—The paper was followed by a discussion.

LIVERPOOL LITERARY AND PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.—(Monday, February 3.)

Dr. NEVINS, president, in the chair.—A paper was read by the Rev. John Sephton, reader in Icelandic to University College, Liverpool, on "Some Runic Remains." After discussing the origin and successive phases of the runic writing, the author reviewed all the chief remaining runic ornaments, weapons, and monuments. Special attention was given to the famous inscribed crosses of Bewcastle and Ruthwell. All the objects discussed were exhibited in excellent photographic slides.—The president, in presenting the thanks of the society to Mr. Sephton, dwelt upon the occult and necromantic uses of the runes.—Dr. Newton pointed out that they had manifestly been intended, by their shape, to be at first inscribed on wood.—Dr. R. J. Lloyd called attention to the theory recently advanced by Mr. W. H. Stevenson in the ACADEMY of October 26 (p. 340), that the Solway district, in which both these crosses lay, had been colonised from the Solway Frith by Frisians, long before the Angles had penetrated so far west. He noted that some of the words deciphered—e.g., saec, gear, haefun,—seemed to have forms not usually Anglian, and perhaps due to Frisian or Saxon influence.

VICTORIA INSTITUTE.—(Monday, February 3.)

T. CHAPLIN, Esq., M.D., in the chair.—Prof. E. Hull described the results of his survey in the Peninsula of Sinai, and pointed out the errors into which recent writers had fallen in regard to the identification of Mount Sinai.—Sir Charles Wilson and others took part in a discussion which ensued, and supported Prof. Hull's conclusions.

ARCHAEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—(Wednesday, Feb. 5.)

JUDGE BAYLIS, vice-president, in the chair.—Mr. A. Oliver exhibited a painting of the Trinity on alabaster, a silver-gilt plaque of St. Peter (surrounded by small paintings on ivory), and an Egyptian figure.—Mr. C. E. Keyser read a paper on "Recently Discovered Mural Paintings at Willingham Church, Cambridgeshire, and elsewhere in the South of England," but confined his remarks to the counties of Suffolk, Essex, Hertford, Kent, Sussex, Hampshire, Dorset, and Devonshire, leaving Willingham Church to be dealt with in a subsequent paper. The author commenced with describing the twelfth and fifteenth century paintings at Lakenheath Church, Suffolk, and the Norman paintings at Heybridge and Copford in Essex. Passing on to Littlebourne and Boughton Aluph in Kent, he dealt with the little church of Clayton in Sussex, and described the large and early representation of the Doom therein depicted. The paintings of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries representing the Annunciation and St. Michael weighing souls, found at Rotherfield, were then described; also a fine example of St. Christopher at West Grinstead. Mention was made of a large fourteenth-century painting of St. Michael weighing souls at Catherington Church, Hampshire, and of the most recently discovered paintings at Wellow of the figure of St. Thomas à Becket, Edmund of Pontigny, Archbishop of Canterbury, besides other figures. The paper closed with descriptions of paintings to be seen at Wimborne Minster in Dorset, and at Axmouth in Devon. Mr. Keyser promised to read the remaining portion of the paper at the May meeting.—Mr. Talfourd Ely exhibited, and read a paper on, a terra-cotta figure found in Cyprus by Major Alessandro di Cesnola, and published in Selamias as "a bearded Hercules . . . in a lion's skin." Mr. Ely showed that this was incorrect, and that the figure was that of Seilenos, of a somewhat refined type. Seilenos was a favourite subject with artists of every kind. A cast was shown of the unique tetradrachm of Aetna with the head of Seilenos. Mr. Ely traced the development of Seilenos from an independent Asiatic deity of flowing water (as on the Ficoroni diata) to the position of a drunken servant of Dionysos. As to outward form, the lowest type is the Papposilenos. A nobler conception is found when Seilenos appears as the guardian of the infant Dionysos. Like other water-deities, Seilenos was gifted with wisdom and prophetic powers. To idyllic poetry he is what Troisies is to tragedy and Calchas to epic verse. Though sometimes confounded with Satyr, he is distinctly their superior, as in the satyric drama and in the pageants of the Ptolemies. His rugged features were well adapted for grylli and to ward off the evil eye. Like Pan, he formed an excellent foil for Eros, and other types of youthful beauty so prevalent in later Greek art. Mr. Ely came to the conclusion that his terra-cotta represented an actor playing the part of Seilanos.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

WE understand that a meeting of Royal Academicians will be held on Wednesday next, February 20, for the purpose of electing a new president, in succession to Lord Leighton. On such an occasion Associates are not present.

THE Royal Academy has filled up its list of honorary foreign members by the election of Herr Adolf Menzel and M. Paul Dubois; and has also elected two Associates—Mr. Solomon J. Solomon and Mr. Edwin A. Abbey.

THE Royal Scottish Academy, too, held a general meeting on Wednesday, which resulted in the election of one painter (Mr. John Lavery), one sculptor (Mr. W. G. Stevenson), and three architects (Messrs. H. J. Blanc, W. Leiper, and J. Honeyman).

AT a general meeting of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours held last week, Mr. R. Allen and Mr. Arthur Hopkins were elected full members, and Mr. J. M. Swan, Mr. H. S. Hopwood, Mr. W. E. Lockhart, and Miss Mildred Butler were elected associates.

MR. A. S. MURRAY, keeper of Greek and Roman antiquities at the British Museum, will begin next Monday a course of six lectures on sculpture at the Royal Academy. He proposes to devote four lectures to "The Representation of Deities," and two to "The Art of Asia Minor."

THE second general meeting of the Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies will be held at 22, Albemarle-street, on Monday next, at 5 p.m., when Mr. Edmund Oldfield will read a paper on "The Mausoleum at Halicarnassus."

AT the London Institution on Monday next, Mr. Seymour Lucas, A.R.A., will give a lecture on "Picture Painting," with illustrations.

THE February number of the Studio, which commences a new volume, will contain an article upon the work of Mr. Poynter, illustrated with a reproduction of the design made by him, in conjunction with the late Lord Leighton, for the decoration of the dome of St. Paul's.

THE sons of the late James Reid, of Glasgow, who died eighteen months ago, have given to the Glasgow Corporation the following ten pictures, for which it is stated that their father paid £22,000: "Pastorale Souvenir d'Italie," by Corot; "Modern Italy," by Turner; "Hamstead Heath," by Constable; cattle piece, by Troyon; "The Sculptor's Studio," by Mr. Alma Tadema; "The Frugal Meal," by Josef Israels; "The Farmer's Daughter," by Mr. W. Q. Orchardson; "Downward Rays," by John Linnell, sen.; "The Wane of the Day," by Charles Jacque; "Windsor Castle," by Patrick Nasmyth.

MR. FREDERICK KEPPEL appears to have opened in New York—and not for the first time—an exhibition of somewhat unusual interest. Mr. George Wharton Edwards—recognising, it would seem, more fully than the English public is yet ripe to do, that ordinary "illustration" of fine literature is rather an impertinence than an assistance—has made designs for Edmund Spenser's "Epithalamion" which avoid the popular yet idle competition with a great literary artist.

"He justly," says Mr. Keppel, "calls his pictures 'certain imaginative drawings,' and while, like the poem itself, they are instinct with the spirit of 'the spacious times of great Elizabeth,' yet, as he wisely avoids exact pictorial representation, he cannot be accused of missing what he never intended to hit."

Would that an equal discretion were possessed by the English so-called "illustrator"—or the ordinary American, for the matter of that—who imagines, for instance, that Wordsworth's sonnet on Westminster Bridge has its spirit fully attained to by a vulgar representation of the mere proportions of the bridge, and the clever suggestion of a tramcar at one end of it and a House of Parliament at the other. We have no objection whatever to the tramcar itself; but it has got to be seen by the eye of an artist, and the illustrating draughtsman is an artist but very rarely.

THE STAGE.

"THE SIGN OF THE CROSS."

THE circumstance of Mr. Wilson Barrett's return may stir up even a now infrequent playgoer to the expression of an opinion on "The Sign of the Cross," a piece which before its arrival at the Lyric, where Mr. Wilson Barrett is now happily housed, had been received in the great English towns with much discussion, but with a quite unusual measure of approval. And—there can be no shadow of doubt about it—the new play, of which the principal actor is himself the author, has remarkable qualities that arrest attention. It is bold in conception and presentment; its stage workmanship displays the cunning hand; its characterisation is the effort of a dramatist who deals with people, not with puppets: with souls and not with mannequins. Nor is the list of its real qualities exhausted when these have been named, for the interest which the piece arouses at the beginning is maintained to the end: there is not a dull five minutes, though there is one painful moment—that in which there is heard from beyond the stage the ghastly cry of the martyr submitted to torture; there is an element of humour; a modern colloquialism, here and there, that is refreshing, and brings the matter of the scene home to "men's business and bosoms"; and, last, and best of all, though the Christianity presented takes here and there a form somewhat too Evangelical for contemporary taste—the Christianity of Simeon of the eighteenth century, rather than the longer-lived Christianity of St. Peter and St. Paul—last, and best of all, there is not a doubt about it (and this the ministers of the Church, and reasonable laymen too, have recognised everywhere), the moral of the piece is exalted, the tone fine. Not even the strait-laced can make, as I suppose, one word of objection to an influence obviously healthy, and, I should think, penetrating and profound. The charge of "irreverence" could be raised only by those most anxious to divorce belief from life. "Duty"—the belle noir of Scandinavian agnosticism—is here presented as great and as sufficient. No wonder, then, that those from whose ill-equipped minds the latter-day illumination is withheld, welcome a piece which not only dares to have "a moral," but dares to have it on the right side.

The interpretation of the piece—rectified, as I believe, in one or two of its details since the first night in London—is worthy of the spirit in which the author has wrought. It is, indeed, of singular completeness. The Marcus of Mr. Barrett is that which all the classical characters of an actor of noble presence are quite sure to be—stately and authoritative; vehement, yet controlled; commanding, yet humane. But, as it to convince us of the flexibility of the artist, there is a part within a part (which has, indeed, its appropriate place, and is played with the utmost discretion), and in this—it is in the scene of the visit of Marcus disguised, a Roman Haroun Alraschid, in the cell of the Christians—Mr. Wilson Barrett achieves no partial metamorphosis, but is another being altogether. Admirably and with splendid pertinacity as Mr. Barrett has worked in the past, he wins, as author, actor, mellour-en-scène, his fullest triumph in "The Sign of the Cross"; and, in regard to his work here, nothing that falls short of the most cordial recognition has any claim to be considered justice.

Excellent, too, is Mr. Barrett supported by his present company. In the fashioning of his play he has behaved to them with generosity—he has given them good parts. Scarcely one person is there who has not some opportunity of legitimately distinguishing himself. The parts of Nero; of Tigellinus, his counsellor; and of Glabrio, a patrician, fat and lusty, and with countenance coloured with Falernian wine—all these parts are effective. The good-natured Epicureanism of Glabrio, the adamantine cruelty of the counsellor, the quite devilish vices of Caesar—his jaded appetites whipped up, with Roman strength of will, to new enjoyments—all these are brought out with force. Mr. Ambrose Manning is Glabrio; Mr. Charles Hudson Tigellinus; and as Nero Mr. Franklyn McKleay shows an especial ingenuity. They are all good character portraits—that of Mr. McKleay cannot pass from the mind. The boy Stephanus, whom they place upon the rack, is played—only too well, of course, for my own low-toned, dull-coloured taste—by Miss Haidée Wright. Miss Grace Warner is an agreeable Poppaea; Miss Daisy Belmore a reasonably seductive Dacia; while as Berenis, an affluent and well-born Roman, so passionately in love with Marcus that we are fain to forgive her a round dozen of her iniquities, Miss Corunna Riccardo plays with fire, discretion, subtlety. But in regard to the performance of the ladies the trump card in Mr. Barrett's hand lies in the possession of Miss Maud Jeffries, of whom for the last two years there has been good report from the provinces and from America, but who now is seen for the first time among us. She has, to begin with, the incomparable gift of a high and a distinguished beauty: "beauty, about the best thing God invents," as Mr. Browning makes Fra Lippo Lippi say—and he meant it for himself, certainly. Miss Jeffries has much besides that, however; for in her part of Marcia she not only resists each one of those many opportunities for rant and gush which such a part—vehement, exalted—of necessity lays open to her, but displays an unerring since sympathetic intelligence, a tenderness and delicacy scarcely, I think, to be bettered.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

"If the remainder of the score equal these two magnificent pieces, Hercules is a masterpiece unknown to the public." Thus wrote Victor Schoelcher in his Life of Handel, the two numbers to which he referred being the March and the chorus, "Crown with festal pomp." Had the biographer taken the trouble to examine the score, he would scarcely have cast his sentence in hypothetical form. Handel's "Hercules" is a powerful work; and its revival—it had not been heard in London, we believe, since 1877, when it was performed under the direction of the late Henry Leslie—by the Handel Society at the People's Palace on Saturday evening, most welcome. "The Messiah," "Israel," and "Judas Maccabeus," a few songs and choruses from other oratorios, with the so-called "Harmonious Blacksmith" represent the stock in knowledge of many musicians with regard to the master. For what the Handel Society has done to rescue neglected works from oblivion, one should be thankful; some day they may be able to accomplish still greater things. The special conditions under which the performance of "Hercules" was given on Saturday lent to it special interest.

The question of additional accompaniments—a vexed one—occasionally arises; and as the finger of time lays his mark on this or that masterpiece, it will ever recur. For the moment, however, we are concerned with original accompaniments: an attempt was made on Saturday to give Handel's music with the composer's own scoring, and with something like the proper balance of instruments and voices. We say an "attempt," for the scheme could not be carried out to the last detail. A grand pianoforte in place of the harpsichord represents a distinct change of tone-colour: an instrument of the latter kind would, however, have been inaudible to most of the audience at the People's Palace. Then again, the harpsichord part was never written out by the composer. Prof. Prout, who accompanied the recitatives and songs on the pianoforte, discharged his duty in an able manner. Yet he could only follow the composer longo intervallo. To the composer, the written notes and figures were no written law, but, as it were, shorthand notes which by the power of genius he could, and no doubt did, elaborate on the spur of the moment. The pianoforte, however, represented contrast, both to the organ and to the orchestra.

The composition of the orchestra employed by Handel differed radically from that of the present day. Oboes played with the violins, and bassoons with the basses, though sometimes, as here, for instance, in the air "Alcides," the wind was heard apart from the strings. The brass in this oratorio is used with singular moderation: trumpets and drums are only employed in the two numbers mentioned by Schoelcher; by very reason, however, of their rarity, the effect they do produce is indeed striking. In a modern orchestra we have strings, wood-wind, and brass; Handel's contrasting elements were strings compounded with wood-wind, organ, and harpsichord. When only a faint-hearted attempt is made to reproduce Handel's orchestration, or when additional accompaniments are used, the master's methods of combination and contrast are spoilt. Thus the performance was instructive as well as interesting. The principal vocalists were Miss M. Davies, Miss K. Lunn, Mr. J. Probert, and Mr. F. Harford; and they all discharged their duties well. The chorus was good. Mr. E. G. Croager conducted ably at the organ, and Mr. J. S. Liddle conducted with care and intelligence.

MR. BISPHAM gave the last of his series of winter concerts on Tuesday, when the programme illustrated "Modern Music of Various Schools." The schools were those of Germany, Italy, and France. The second concert was devoted, it is true, to English music; one or two specimens of modern English art might, however, have been included on the present occasion, or the title, quoted above, modified. So far as concerns the programme itself, it was one of considerable interest. Gabriel Faure's graceful "Les Roses d'Ispahan," was charmingly sung by Mdlle. Landi, and Mr. Bispham interpreted in artistic manner a sentimental "Cycle of Songs" by Toëti, and "Quandi era Paggio" from "Falstaff." Mdlle. Landi introduced three songs, all new to us. The first, by the Russian composer, Rimski-Korsakow, is quaint and clever; the second, by Camille Chevillard, graceful and expressive; and the third, by Saint-Saëns, characteristic and pleasing. Mr. Bispham also gave a group of novelties. The first, entitled "Salomo," by Mr. Henschel, is effective, particularly the striking accompaniment admirably played by the composer; the other songs, by Norwegian, Russian, and German composers, were all attractive. Last of all came a Cycle of Songs, "Poème d'Amour," love music quite French in character, yet, of its kind, able. Miss F. Davies played pianoforte solos by Brahms and Liszt in her very best manner. Signor Piatti, in "Kol Nidrei" and a showy piece of his own, contributed to the success of the afternoon. Mr. Hermann Vesin recited a ballad by Hebbel in German, and also Shelley's "The Fugitives," and was well received. Schumann's pianoforte accompaniments were excellently performed by Mr. H. Bird. The composer, in a letter to Van Bruyck, describes the effect as "peculiar." He was right; and, we think, would have been still more so had he added, "yet unsatisfactory."

MISS MARGARET PIERREPONT and Miss Katherine Alston gave a concert at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening. The former is a pianist whose technique is neat and touch delicate. Her first solo was Bach's "English Suite" in A minor, or rather a portion of it, for she passed directly from the Prelude to the Sarabande. Miss Pierrepont was heard to best advantage in the slow movement of Saint-Saëns' clever Sonata in C minor for piano or violoncello, in which she was admirably supported by Mr. Paul Ludwig. Miss Alston has a voice of fair quality, and has been well trained, but nervousness prevented her doing justice either to herself or to the music. Herr Willy Burmeister played solos by Spohr and Bach with brilliant and well-deserved success. Mr. P. Ludwig's solo performances deserve honourable mention.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE eighty-fourth season of the Philharmonic Society will commence on Thursday evening, February 27. It will, as usual, consist of seven concerts. Among the novelties we note a Symphony (No. 2 in B minor) by A. Borodine, the Russian composer, which will be performed for the first time at the first concert; Mr. Paderewski will introduce a new "Scotch Fantasia" for piano and orchestra, composed expressly by Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie; Mr. Johannes Wolff, a new violin concerto by B. Godard; Dr. Dvorák will contribute and conduct some new orchestral works of his own. The list of pianists is especially strong—M. M. Eugen D'Albert, Sophie Menter, Reisenhauer, Rosenthal, Sapellnikoff, Sauer, and last, but not least, Paderewski. Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie will again be the conductor.

A LIST of the orchestral works performed at the Sunday Afternoon Orchestral Concerts at Queen's Hall since October 6, has been forwarded to us. We notice with pleasure the catholicity of the scheme, and the high-class character of the music selected. To the energy and enterprise of Mr. R. Newman the success of these concerts is in large measure due.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

THE GUARDIAN.—"It is certainly a convenience to have the history of Dissent in England presented in a connected form, and from a Dissenter's point of view. And for these purposes we can recommend this, which gives the history in a handy and convenient form."

TIMES.—"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Readers will find here in a clear and attractive form much information which cannot readily be found anywhere else."

LITERATURE.

Life of Cardinal Manning, Archbishop of Westminster. By Edmund Sheridan Purcell. In 2 vols. (Macmillans.)

(First Notice.)

THIS is a big, diffuse, and untidy book. There are many repetitions, more misprints—of which, perhaps, as many as half figure in the errata—and not a few omissions. For instance, on p. 112, vol. i., there is a reference to a letter of Archdeacon Denison's Appendix, note G. On turning to the Appendix, we find it ends with note E, and the text does not seem to contain a reference to note F. In the second volume we are told that Manning was much worried by a wrangle with Sir George Bowyer about a hospital in Great Ormond-street, and not how the matter ended. In the discussion of Manning's later views on the Temporal Power, we are referred to his letters to Lady Herbert. If they are given, it is without name. The author, too, betrays a very vague perception of "values" in dealing with Manning's Anglican entourage. He persists in calling Archdeacon Hare an Evangelical, and has a forcible-feeble paragraph about the shallowness of Hook, one of the most earnest and generous of men, who held one of the possible theories of Anglicanism very clearly and consistently, and also held that all schools and parties should subordinate their theories to the success of practical pastoral work.

But, with all its faults, the book will be indispensable to students of the ecclesiastical history of England in the nineteenth century. Cardinal Manning wrote a great many diaries, he hoarded a great many letters, he filled whole portfolios in his later life with newspaper cuttings about himself. When the Whithall Review or Truth misrepresented him, he sat down and wrote a refutation, which he was too wise to send to the papers. He required no provocation to draw up endless autobiographical notes. One of the great concerns of his old age was a prolonged self-examination: his heart did not condemn him, and he opened it pretty freely to his future biographer. At one time he wished his life as an Anglican to be forgotten, and he destroyed his Anglican letters to Gladstone and all family correspondence during the period of his marriage. Mr. Purcell received from the Cardinal's executors unrestricted access to this mass of materials. He concluded, not unreasonably, that all which had not been destroyed was meant to be used; and when he found that the executors took a different view, he stopped his ears and went his way. He assumed that Manning had decided in advance all the questions of delicacy and reserve which biographers, when they decide for themselves, decide in a very different spirit. He was fascinated by the idea of giving an inside view of the life of a great man, whom he sincerely admired and possibly overrated. He forgot that of many things the inside is the wrong side, without its being truer than the right. Bishop Blougram may be consulted with much advantage on the subject. It is obvious from the protests of Cardinal Vaughan in the Nineteenth Century and of the Oblate Fathers in the Times for February 1, that Manning lost a very great deal by being turned inside out; but, as Newman said, Manning was not easy to understand, and, allowing for everything, Mr. Purcell does help us to understand him. His disclosures are certainly unsparing, and probably one-sided; but there are few, if any, traces of misrepresentation or exaggeration; and the facts as reported are interpreted intelligently, with a wholly excusable tendency to sacrifice the Archdeacon of Chichester to the Archbishop of Westminster.

Unluckily Manning had not a good memory for facts or dates. He confused the Academy and the Chronicle; what was more important, he confused J. B. Mozley, the Bampton Lecturer, and T. Mozley, the author of the Reminiscences, and he was never quite certain as to the year of his own birth. Generally he was under the impression that he was born in 1808. Mr. Richmond, who knew him before 1837, believed that Manning was born, as he was himself, in 1807. Mr. Purcell thinks that Manning knew this on February 1, 1832, when he wrote that he was by six months only qualified to take orders, because, according to Mr. Purcell, the canonical age for taking orders is twenty-four. A better argument is, that in some verses written on July 15 (his birthday), 1835, he wrote that he had lived twenty-eight years in unprofitable ways. In adding a stanza in 1861 he did not reconsider the date. He was baptised in May, 1809; but for the present it must be left uncertain whether his father waited ten months or twenty-two for a bishop to perform the ceremony. He was the youngest of ten children: his father was married twice, but only two belonged to the first family. Mr. Manning the elder was a West India merchant who flourished largely so long as the West Indies flourished, and was for some forty years a member of Parliament and a director of the Bank of England. He was very generous with his money, and had also a taste for aristocratic society, which one of his sons inherited and mortified. Manning heartily admired his father, but does not seem to have been influenced by him directly: his mother talked to him more, and told him when he was reading despondently for honours at Oxford, "I never knew you undertake anything you did not do." This showed insight, for Manning ripened late. He remembered little of the two preparatory schools to which he went, except the risks his faith and virtue did or did not run there. At one of them he read the Book of Revelation: thenceforward "the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone" never even faded in his memory. At Harrow, which he thought his worst time, he assimilated Paley's Evidences and Leslie on Deism, the conclusions of which always remained by him. He was a great dandy, and once at least boldly shared with the future Bishop of St. Andrews the joys of clandestine champagne. The future Bishop of Montreal noted that he did not care to talk when he could not be king of his company: aut Caesar, aut nullus, was already his motto. This makes it strange that he learnt nothing; and his father thought of taking him into his office, though he had intended him for a clergyman. At all times he was fitter than most lads of his years for the career which did not attract him, though he preferred it to commerce.

It is characteristic of the terms on which he stood with his father that he got his brother-in-law, Mr. John Anderdon, to arrange both for his allowance at the university and for the preliminary expense of nine months' reading with a private tutor, the Rev. William Fisher, of Poulshott, who taught him to apply his mind and value intellectual accuracy. Manning, like Lord Shaftesbury, another Harrow pupil of Fisher, took a first-class. What was perhaps more important, Manning's ambition was stimulated by his success at the Union: he was the king of the place between the reigns of S. Wilberforce and Gladstone. He could talk for an hour without tiring his audience on the question whether the Union should take American newspapers which nobody wanted to read, because it was becoming to Englishmen to take an interest in America. He had disciples who had an appetite for grossly inaccurate and highly technical information as to the meaning of a cargo of barilla. So far as we are told, none of the elder Manning's sons were ambitious of parliamentary honours except the youngest, who pressed his claims after his father's bankruptcy, early in 1831. Mr. Manning had many friends, who bought in his life interest in his wife's marriage settlement, and subscribed to provide him an income; but all they could or would do to further H. E. Manning's hopes was to beg him a supernumerary clerkship in the Colonial Office. Manning, in later life, supposed that his resignation of this signified the renunciation of political life; and, in spite of Mr. Purcell, it seems probable he was right. As nearly as can be guessed, he threw it up under a strong impulse of some kind. He had not nearly enough to do, he was perhaps hardly in the humour to make the most of what there was: he divided his time between looking his last at his father's deserted country house at Coombe, browsing, as he had done before, in the library, and making love to a Miss Deffell, whose father thought his prospects too doubtful for an engagement, though he allowed a correspondence. Manning's attachment was not of the kind to grow stronger in absence. The lady was more constant: at least she died unmarried. If he had stuck to the Colonial Office in a practical spirit he would no doubt have risen high, though he was fitter for diplomacy than administrative work. However, he decided to be ordained. He had missed one fellowship at Merton because he meant to stand as a layman; he ascertained that he would be elected to another if he pledged himself to take orders. In later life, he dwelt on a long interview with Henry Blunt, of Chelsea, when he probably was flushed with higher views of the clerical office. He had already been "converted" in his last long vacation as an undergraduate by Miss Bevan, of Mount Park, whom he long regarded as his spiritual mother.* And his family, when against their advice he had clung to the chances of a secular career, would have preferred his keeping the post which it had cost some trouble to get him. In his correspondence at the time he put his decision on prudential grounds; and it would be quite true, though by no means the whole truth, to say that George Herbert yielded to common sense and family pressure in renouncing his ambitions as a courtier.

Manning's zeal was always tempered by prudence: he looked about for an easy curacy and worked it hard. Henry Wilberforce, who was himself engaged to one of the daughters of Mr. John Sargent, the saintly Squarson of Lavington, while another was already married to Samuel Wilberforce, found an opening for his future brother-in-law. Manning's own theory of his Anglican life was that he was a pietist unattached; and this in a way was true. It was equally true that, in whatever Church he happened to be a communicant, he was sure to be a strict and strenuous Churchman. From his boyhood he had said his prayers regularly to keep from hell; from his youth up he ate very sparingly, being persuaded that, though he did not know what gout was, he had it in his stomach. Horace Walpole, who in his day was abstemious and hardy in his personal habits, posed rather as a valetudinarian than as an ascetic. Manning did not remain a curate long: he went to Lavington in January, 1833; in May he succeeded Mr. Sargent as rector; in November he married his daughter. At that time he ranked with the Evangelicals; but he maintained the daily service which he found, and punished late arrivals by stopping till they had got into their places. One day—we are not told the date—probably after the death of Mr. Manning in 1835, Mrs. Manning, according to T. Mozley, whom Manning would have contradicted if he could, fell down in church while hurrying to her place. Apart from this touch of the martinet, the Rector of Lavington was the model of a faithful and affectionate pastor. His wife helped him admirably till she died in 1837. Manning repeatedly dated the beginning of his career from her death. In one of his autobiographical notes he explained that when he married he knew no better. Keble, Pusey, and Neale all agreed with Manning in his later phase that celibacy was the higher state, but never left behind anything remotely resembling an apology for having married. Pusey, indeed, was filled by remorse at the thought of the sins which brought on him the judgment of widowhood. Manning marked the date of 1837 on a list of special mercies drawn up in 1847, though he, too, was almost broken-hearted at the time. In 1835 he delivered his first public sermon in Chichester Cathedral, at the visitation of Archdeacon Webber, and declared for the Apostolical Succession—as was necessary, since "Apostolic unity of faith and practice withered away in the hollow sameness of Roman ceremonial." The sermon was written with the help of his brother-in-law, John Anderdon, who had taken much pains with Manning's English style. In 1836 he joined the protest against Hampden's appointment to the Divinity chair, and wrote as "A Catholic Priest," to censure Wiseman for confounding the Church of England with Biblical Protestantism. Yet about that time he came up to London to vote at a meeting of the S.P.C.K., and "defend the Evangelical cause against the attempts of the Archbishop." Two years later, he was emancipating the Society from Evangelical subscribers who used to blackball tracts which had passed the committee and five or six bishops—which in principle was clearly wrong and in practice very unimportant, and therefore an ideal subject for clerical agitation. In 1838 Manning delivered a very characteristic sermon on the "Rule of Faith" at Bishop Otter's visitation. With its controversial appendices, which the Bishop tried to keep out, it covers the same ground as Newman's "Prophetical Office of the Church." It is as clear, peremptory, and optimistic as the work of the greater writer was stimulating and enigmatical. Rome and popular Protestantism are condemned alike, for exalting a living judge against the written perpetual rule. Though the sermon is full of compliments to the Reformers, and scarcely goes beyond the position of Jewell, it offended the Evangelicals, and after he became Archdeacon in 1840 he never reprinted it. Manning was always a man of peace; as yet he had no secular ambition, except to be popular and esteemed in the diocese. He found a suitable opening for his activity in a moderate opposition to the Ecclesiastical Commission, which alarmed vested interests and startled scrupulous consciences by undertaking to redistribute ecclesiastical endowments without canonical authority. Characteristically, Manning's opposition cooled as soon as the Commissioners were at work under a Parliamentary statute. Meanwhile, he employed himself innocently enough in organising diocesan societies for educational and other laudable objects, of which he made the elderly Dean the figurehead, and so incidentally, and it may be unintentionally, was making himself indispensable.

When he was appointed Archdeacon in succession to Webber, he maintained his customary prudence. Almost all his charges are adapted to bring the clergy of the archdeaconry into rank along the lines of least resistance. In 1841, he said: "It is not coercion, nor worldly power, nor favour of legislature, nor Parliamentary rallyings, but charity that must bend men's hearts to us." In 1848, after Lord John Russell had forced Dr. Hampden on the See of Hereford, he made an ingenious attempt—not in the interest of Dr. Hampden, but in that of the Church of England—to put a good face on a shabby business. As Hampden had signed over again orthodox-sounding formulas he had signed before, he suggested, like Wordsworth when Stanley was installed at Westminster, that his signature was equivalent to a recantation of any heresies he might have held. In general he insisted that the "Church was to go her own way, neither leaning on civil powers nor opposing them," and denied that the great question was between opposing Christian communions. The choice was really "between loyalty to a Master unseen and the licence of the individual will." From first to last there is a marked contrast between the charges and the sermons: the charges are safe and practical, full of good advice about schools and pews, with little or nothing to make a moderately serious parson or churchwarden of any way of thinking uncomfortable. The sermons are remarkable for their uncompromising rigorism; one of them set Mr. Gladstone inquiring seriously and humbly whether a hard-working and healthy M.P. was really bound to fast and attend daily service. All have something the tone of addresses given during a retreat to candidates for perfection: the preacher is never content to water the bruised reed or fan the smoking flax; the temptations he deals with are the subtle temptations which assail those who pass for blameless.

From the time that Manning became an Archdeacon he never lost sight of the possibility of a Bishopric. He was quite in earnest about renouncing the world, but the world for some time liked him all the better for the elegant unearthliness of his aspect. He was knowing in horseflesh and he told good stories, and his health required him to spend his winters with his half-sister in Cadogan-place. Meanwhile his views were becoming more advanced; he was moving by a route of his own in the same direction as the Tractarians. He was an ally rather than a disciple. He was beginning to find that the witness of the undivided Church covered much that would have shocked the Reformers. But like Rose, and unlike the Tractarians, he had a high and hopeful opinion of the Church of England as a working institution. He was especially keen in the agitation against Erastianism. When he went to Rome in the winter of 1838, he was repelled rather than edified by what he saw. The promise of the Colonial Bishops' Fund seemed in his judgment to have outweighed the performances of the College of Propaganda. Hence, when it became known that in 1843 Newman had despaired of the Church of England, Manning—who had done his best to discourage controversy about Tract XC.—had tried to take the lead, not of the Oxford Movement, but of the Church party which had grown up round it. On November 5, 1843, he preached a strong No-Popery sermon. Its tone is curiously calm. The preacher allowed the facts, as he saw them, to speak for themselves. He contrasted the prospects of Romanism and Anglicanism. The Ultramontane revival had not begun in Spain, and he did not discern its progress in

* When he became a Roman Catholic, he got back his letters to her, and destroyed them with her to him.

France. He condemned Smithfield and the Spanish Armada, Gunpowder Plot, and the luckless enterprise of James II., and appealed triumphantly to Providence and history.

In his own judgment, the years from 1843 to the spring of 1847 were a time of spiritual declension, the time when he was most worldly-minded. He sent in his name for the preacherhip at Lincoln's Inn, but refused to canvass. To the scandal of Mr. Purcell, the Benchers elected a cleric who needed the money. His candidature, such as it was, went against his conscience. When the appointment of sub-almoner to the Queen was offered to him, on his brother-in-law's preferment, he refused it, after much heart-searching, in order to punish himself. He was still in the stage when men regret their sacrifices. In 1846, he went out more than ever into society. His faith in the Church of England was beginning to be shaken. In his diary from 1844-47, and in his letters to Laprimaundaye, his curate and confessor in 1847, and to Robert Wilberforce before and after 1846, we have ample materials for judging of the stages of a process not very interesting to outsiders. It was slower than Mr. Purcell realises. It was a shock to him to realise that the Roman Church had points of superiority. He speaks of moral objections beginning to melt away while intellectual objections remain. He complains that the Church of England is an object of reason, not of faith; Rome has the best of the principles and England of the details. In 1847 there was a great crisis: he had a bad attack of bronchitis in the spring, thought himself dying, and, according to Mr. Gladstone's testimony, which he did not admit himself,* had a deathbed intuition that the Church of England was part of the mystical body, and was honestly shocked to find himself jealous of his curate, who had more Easter communicants than he had ever had. As soon as he could move he was sent abroad, and began to investigate Roman Catholicism on the spot. He had to come back, but was in Rome from November 27, 1847, to May 11, 1848—conveniently out of the way of the Hampden business, as was noted at the time. In Rome he knelt for the first time to Pius IX. in the Piazza di Spagna. He lived with the Liberals and idealised the Pope, and remembered what he said to other people much better than what they said to him.

The Gorham case came upon Manning as a surprise. He had never realised that a merely parliamentary court could determine in the last resort what doctrines did or did not disqualify for preferment in the Established Church. This discovery, when James Hope forced the truth upon him, affected Manning more than the decision when it came. He told Gladstone, who was in bed with influenza, the news. Gladstone jumped up and said that the Church of England must clear herself or perish; and, according to Manning, declared at the famous meeting of thirteen, that as a Privy Councillor (he had resigned office in order to support the Maynooth Grant with clean hands) he could not sign their resolutions. Subsequently he invented a theory of the supremacy of his own, thought the Church of England had recovered her freedom so soon as Convocation was allowed a few days of debate, and said, when Manning became a Roman Catholic, "I felt as if he had murdered my mother by mistake." Manning himself worked busily, if not hopefully, at all the schemes for clearing the Church of England: his own favourite plan was a declaration that the clergy only acknowledge the supremacy in the sense which Hope had proved to him was wrong. The declaration fell very flat. Meanwhile, it became clear that the Church of England resented the "Papal aggression" much more keenly than the Gorham judgment, and Manning made up his mind. In the course of 1850 he still felt, and warned his penitents of, the weight of the historical objections to the Roman position, and very sensibly told one of them that the salvation of ordinary people could not depend upon a right judgment on intricate questions of controversy. In his Anglican days he always held that "conversion," if justifiable at all, ought to be a very long business. Almost to the last he believed in English orders, and was pained to find himself a layman.

He told Mme. Belloc early in the sixties that after his reception he said to himself, "Now my career is over"; and, though duly thankful to Wiseman for the promptitude with which he re-ordained him, found it a great trial to go about the streets in a Roman collar. He had given up much. He had been an ideal country parson; if he had been as fertile as Gladstone in explanations which saved the situation for his own conscience, he would certainly have been a bishop; as it was, he had no reasonable prospect of rising higher than a fashionable preacher.

G. A. SIMCOX.

Poems. By W. B. Yeats. (Fisher Unwin.)

IN this thrice-taking volume, with its pale buff and gold covers of mystic design, we have the total accomplishment in poetry, so far, of Mr. Yeats. It contains, he tells us, all he cares "to preserve out of his previous volumes of verse," in some cases revised, in others re-written; and the result is as handsome an argument as a younger poet need wish to offer contemporary criticism. With it, in fact, so far as that criticism goes, Mr. Yeats may be said to emerge from the coteries and to reach the centre.

In putting it together Mr. Yeats has clearly subjected himself to a severer criticism than any but hypercritics else are likely to offer. Those who have learnt to know his poems in those slim earlier volumes, out of which this is built, may complain, possibly, over some of his new readings of familiar passages and new versions of familiar names; as in his conversion of "Oisín" to "Usheen." Again, they will miss some favourite pieces, such as more than one of the lyrics in that Shelleyan fragment, "The Island of Statues," and among them the delightful song of the voices, which was well worth the pains of revision. Thus it begins:

"A man has the fields of heaven,
But soulless a fairy dies,
As a leaf that is old and withered and cold,
When the wintry vapours rise."

Again, in the curious "Indian Song" in the same first volume, which now reappears as "The Indian to his Love," and which, in shedding something of its extravagance, loses something of its lyric fervour, the ear of many of his readers will not sanction the practical suppression of such a verse as this:

"Oh wanderer in the southern weather,
Our isle awaits us: on each lea
The pea-hens dance; in crimson feather,
A parrot swaying on a tree
Rages at his own image in the enamelled sea."

But, mainly, what one finds in these changes is that if Mr. Yeats is growing rather more literary, he is, too, more severe an artist than he used to be. In making them it is clear that he has tried to heighten the imaginative truth of his poems, even at the cost of throwing away their fanciful trappings. His revision is, then, generally good, if sometimes bad.

That he should have paused to go back and review himself in this way, instead of hastening on, in the fashion of our time, to do endless new things, says much for his artistic conscience; and it is as an artist through and through that he is likely to impress his readers in these collected poems. This alone makes him a notable appearance among the Irish poets, who have hitherto (with two or three notable exceptions) showed more fervour than poetic form, and more facility than fine art. And this, remembering that there are others working with him, may show that Irish literature, in its modern interpretation, has entered on a new phase. So far as one can see now, indeed, it is to Mr. Yeats that men will point hereafter, as marking the beginning of the new period; and this volume of his may serve as a striking landmark in a remarkable movement. Modern criticism has cleared the way and prepared the audience and made the standards plain; and the new poets, if they be indeed poets born, like Mr. Yeats, and not merely made, like Mr. —, have an opportunity such as Keats and Shelley might have envied.

To justify this belief in Mr. Yeats, one is most likely to convince the unbeliever perhaps by quoting him on his lyric side first. What could be more touching and simply convincing than this?

"Down by the salley gardens my love and I did meet;
She passed the salley gardens with little snow-white feet.
She bid me take love easy, as the leaves grow on the tree;
But, I being young and foolish, with her would not agree."

"In a field by the river my love and I did stand,
And on my leaning shoulder she laid her snow-white hand.
She bid me take life easy, as the grass grows on the weirs,
But I was young and foolish, and now am full of tears."

What more haunting, more irresistible, than * Both witnesses, though doubtless veracious, were far too subtle to be trustworthy.

his song of "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," of which I quote the first verse :

"I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree, And a small cabin build there, of clay and wattles made;
Nine bean rows will I have there, a hive for the honey bee,
And live alone in the bee-loud glade."

Such lines as these reach the ear and hold it, and through it touch the heart. A few such songs may suffice for the poet's immortality, and there is no younger poet of our time in whose future fame one may feel a stronger faith.

It remains to speak of the longer poems, and particularly of "The Countess Cathleen," whose story—how, in time of famine, she sold her soul to the devil to save the souls of her people—is full of openings peculiarly suited to Mr. Yeats, and to his native feeling for the old associations and lurking traditions of remote Irish countrysides. He has cast the story in dramatic form; and although one may not feel altogether certain of its technical qualities as an acting play, it reads dramatically, as well as being imaginative and profound to a degree. A play may not be judged by passages; but something of its charm may be gathered from these lines of the opening scene, which is laid in an Irish wayside hostelry, "The Inn of Shemus Rua," whose kitchen, with its hanging shrine, is lit by a dim bog-oak fire.

"TRIO :

Hear how the dog bays, mother,
And how the grey hen flutters in the coop.
Strange things are going up and down the land,
These famine times. By Tubber-vanach cross roads
A woman met a man with ears spread out,
And they moved up and down like wings of bats.

"MAIRE :

Shemus stays late.

"TRIO :

By Carrick-orus churchyard,
A herdsman met a man who had no mouth,
Nor ears, nor eyes, his face a wall of flesh.
He saw him plainly by the moon.

"MAIRE (going over to the little shrine) :

White Virgin,
Bring Shemus safe home from the hateful forest:
Save Shemus from the wolves—Shemus is reckless;
And save him from the demons of the woods,
Who have crept out and pace upon the roads,
Deluding dim-eyed souls now newly dead,
And these alive who have gone crazed with famine,
Save him, White Virgin!

"TRIO :

And but now
I thought I heard far-off tympani and harp.
[Knocking at the door.]

"MAIRE :

Shemus has come.

"TRIO :

May he bring better food
Than the lean crow he brought us yesterday.
[MAIRE opens the door, and SHEMUS comes in with a dead wolf on his shoulder.]

Of the other two longer poems in the book, "The Wanderings of Ushen" and "The Land of Heart's Desire," there is not space to say more than that they are equally characteristic, and equally surcharged with the imagination and the Celtic glamour which Mr. Yeats puts into his best work, and which make this volume so perfect a thing of its kind.

ERNEST RHYS.

Memories and Studies of War and Peace. By Archibald Forbes. (Cassells.)

BIG, ugly, affable, with the angelic temper of a woman and the gift of tongues, the ideal war-correspondent, as drawn by Mr. Forbes, must be able to do without food or sleep for a week; to ride a hundred miles at a stretch on anything from a giraffe to a rat; then write for six or eight consecutive hours, at the rate of a column an hour; and—gallop back. He must be reckless of exposure to fire; have a competent knowledge of war, the instinct of scenting the battle from afar, and an intuitive perception of how the day has gone. "There never has been, and there never will be such a man"; but Mr. Forbes has gone far towards realising his own ideal. He gives us his own portrait: he "had seen a battle that lasted six hours, ridden a hundred and twenty miles, and written to the Daily News a telegraphic message four columns long—all in the space of thirty hours." A newspaper prepared to pay at the rate of eightpence a word for 8000 words in a single telegram, and to furnish each of its correspondents with a waggon and pair, several saddle-horses, a couple of servants, and couriers at discretion, is bound to be well served. Mr. Forbes did loyal service, and shares with us the fruits of his labours.

Our lads, of whom so many are hovering between a commission and a ranch, will hail his book as a blue rift in a leaden sky. The oldest and the coldest among us will find his heart moved "more than with a trumpet." It is by no mere witchery of words that Mr. Forbes, word-painter as he is, keeps hold on us from his first chapter to his last. From the dusk of Gravelotte to Osman Pasha's "I did my best," he is telling of things that he has seen, and of men whom he has known. He has ridden in the ranks, and has a soldier's eye, and a soldier's heart. His words go straight home; and his "memories" are so clear, his "studies" so life-like, that we, too, see his scenes, and know his men.

The old king sits his horse at Gravelotte, among the bursting shells; or belabours fugitives with his sword, and swears "fine, racy German oaths"; or (as seen by MacGahan) Skobelev stalks by, his uniform covered with mud and blood, his sword broken, his Cross of St. George twisted round his shoulder, his face black with powder and smoke, his eyes haggard and bloodshot, and his voice quite gone. At Sedan we listen to a coronach:

"The picture rises now before one of that terrible afternoon. The stern ring of German fire, ever encircling with stronger grip that plateau on which were huddled the Frenchmen as in a shambles; the storm of shell-fire that tore lanes through the dense masses, bare to its pitiless blasts; the vehement, yet impotent, protests against the inevitable, in the shape of furious sorties. . . . No semblance of order there, no token of leadership, simply a hell in the heart of which writhed an indiscriminate mass of brave men, with no thought in them but of fighting it out to the bitter end."

At night, on the other side—

"There rose from every bivouac one unanimous chorus of song. . . . The chaunt that filled with solemn harmony the wide valley was Luther's hymn, the glorious 'Nun danket alle Gott.'"

We think of

"those poor Prussian soldiers, carrying a Bible in their knapsack, and devout Psalms in the heart of them"; and how

"King Friederich's soldiers . . . on the eve of battle settle their bits of worldly business; and wind up, many of them, with a hoarse whisper of prayer. Oliver Cromwell's soldiers did so. Gustaf Adolph's; in fact, I think all good soldiers." . . . "With men like these, don't you think I shall have victory this day?"

There is pathos in "Matrimony among the Tombs" and "The Starving Gentlewoman," in "A Hill Story" and "An Honest Born Boy." "Pretty Maritza of Tirnova," and "Distinguished Conduct in the Field" ring true.

Mr. Forbes has the courage of his convictions, and roundly challenges statements and figures in Von Moltke's posthumous History of the Franco-German War. He concentrates his attack on the assertion that at the battle of St. Privat-Gravelotte the French had at their disposal more than 180,000, the Germans exactly 178,818 men. The details must be discussed elsewhere. Mr. Forbes seems clearly to make out that the French numbers are overstated, the German understated, by thousands.

We may well ask "What is Truth?" when we find quoted as an utterance of Moltke:

"Whatever is published in a military history is always draped for effect; yet it is a duty of piety and patriotism never to impair the prestige of our army with personages of high position."

Did the pious and patriotic master of strategy believe that piety and patriotism will prove laggards unless their eyes are seared? Has a half-jocular remark been twisted into a damning reality? Or is the assertion a myth? Major von Moltke has made himself responsible for it in his Preface to his uncle's book.

It was once the fashion to growl at short service boys. It is something to be told that "among its other advantages short service has all but abolished soldiers' wives whose husbands belong to the rank and file. . . . To-day there is no such abomination in the army as the crowding of more than one family in the same room."

Mr. Forbes is writing of what he knows.

The most suggestive chapter in this most impressive book is "The Future of the Wounded in War." Loathe as we will the outspoken brutality of General Sheridan's "nothing should be left to the people but eyes to lament the war"; deny, as we must, that the theory of "the amenities" is "preposterous," and that to cure the wounds of the enemy is illogical; believe, as we are bound to believe, that man is marching onwards, and that the law of nations is doing more and more to stem the brutalities of war; the fact remains that "vas vulneratis will be the cruel watchword of future wars." The field-hospital arrangements, in the German service and our own, are clearly and succinctly detailed by Mr. Forbes. Admirably as they have worked in the past, they must, in the face of improved weapons, be quite inadequate to meet the requirements of the future. The reasons advanced, and the high authorities quoted by Mr. Forbes, give only too much ground for the belief that "the whole system of carrying away the wounded on litters during the battle must be abandoned as impracticable"; and that "the most that can be aimed at is that the wounded man of the future shall be attended to within twenty-four hours." It is true that in ordinary circumstances a wounded man may hold out so long; that, however terrible the future, the brave man will be prepared to face it, be it wounds or death; and that when the end is recognised, the means will be disclosed. To be unprepared for what is certain to come would be a disgrace to humanity. We learned one lesson forty years ago.

H. B. HARRINGTON.

The Life of John Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury. By R. I. Woodhouse. (Longmans.)

It might perhaps be said, with more truth than of many of the persons and events to which Macaulay's famous saying was applied, that every schoolboy has heard of Archbishop Morton, or at least of "Morton's fork." The dilemma which is ascribed to his ingenuity in making demands for money on behalf of Henry VII. has certainly found its way into most modern school books, and from its nature is likely to have attracted the attention of youthful students. They will have heard, with some amount of admiration for the cleverness of the device, how the Chancellor instructed his commissioners as follows:

"If the persons applied to for the benevolence lived frugally, tell them that their parsimony must necessarily have enriched them; if their method of living be hospitable, tell them that they must necessarily be opulent on account of their great expenditure."

It is probable, however, that very few of those to whom his name may be familiar on this account know anything more about Morton. And yet he was a person of considerable eminence during a long and critical period of English history. As Mr. Woodhouse says:

"John Morton was from early years a distinguished man, a popular man, and a man beloved at Oxford. He was the chief civil and ecclesiastical lawyer of his times. He was an active man of business, and an able negotiator. He was the trusted friend and councillor of Henry VI. (especially of his queen), of Edward IV., and of Henry VII.; and if Shakespeare's play is correct, he was the councillor of Edward V., and united the rival factions of York and Lancaster."

Such a career was well worthy of a biography; but it can hardly be said that Mr. Woodhouse's treatment of his subject is altogether adequate. A large portion of his little book is avowedly a compilation from previous writers. He has borrowed whole pages from Dean Hook's Lives of the Archbishops, and has also quoted freely from Mr. Gairdner and other sources. It would, of course, be absurd to expect that a writer should never draw on his predecessors; but we may be allowed to wish that our author had given us a little more original matter. The main body of his narrative, indeed, contains but little that is new; but some valuable facts have been collected in the notes to each chapter, and in the appendix at the end of the book.

In touching on that very dangerous ground, the early history of Oxford, Mr. Woodhouse has not kept himself quite clear of slips. To say that the town "had been a famous city as early as the days of King Alfred"—though by no means such an absurdity as to ascribe to Alfred the foundation of the university—yet goes a little beyond our actual information. As a matter of fact, the first mention of Oxford in authentic history is in the reign of Alfred's son, Edward, when it is referred to as a place of some strength. It is very probable that it may have been fortified by his father as a bulwark against the Danes of Mercia, and that this may be the origin of the myth which connects him with the university; but Mr. Woodhouse should know better than to cite Geoffrey of Monmouth as an authority for early English history. It is again an erroneous statement to say that "in 1172 University College received its first statutes." This is not quite so bad as to ascribe its foundation to Alfred three centuries before, a fiction which the college actually celebrated by a dinner in 1872; but it considerably antedates the origin of the collegiate system at Oxford. As Mr. Freeman said, when exposing the absurdity of the millenary banquet, though the beginnings of the university may be discerned in the twelfth century, "it is not till the thirteenth that we get the first glimpses of anything like colleges in the modern sense. In that age, too, comes, not indeed University College, but the benefaction out of which University College grew."

Mr. Woodhouse gives his hero rather too much credit for steady loyalty to his original party when he says: "Nothing in his life speaks better for the character of Morton than his unshaken fidelity and unbounded zeal to the Lancastrian cause." It is true that he adhered to that side so long as it seemed to have any prospect of success; but after the hopes of the Lancastrians appeared to have been finally shattered in 1471, he made no long delay in going over to their victorious rivals, and the very next year we find him accepting a lucrative appointment from Edward IV. Such tergiversations were common enough in those times, and it would be unjust to judge them with great severity; but still, one who so acted cannot be credited with any such feelings of enthusiastic devotion as the later Jacobites entertained towards the Stuarts, long after their cause was much more hopeless than that of the Lancastrians after Barnet and Tewkesbury.

As to how much of the merit or otherwise of the policy of Henry VII. is to be ascribed to his chancellor, it can hardly be said that we have sufficient data to pronounce a positive opinion. Mr. Woodhouse is naturally inclined to claim for him as large a share as possible.

"Although he appeared merely to execute the measures of the king, he was in reality the chief author of the system for controlling the power of the great feudal barons; and he may be considered the model, as he was the precursor, of Cardinal Richelieu, who in a later age accomplished the same object still more effectually in France."

This is, however, to assert rather more than we have any strict warrant for; and our author himself quotes a little further on a statement from Mr. Gairdner, that "it is difficult to say what kind of influence he exerted on Henry's policy as king." If he really was so completely the moving spirit of the administration as some have supposed, it is rather singular that no great change in the course of domestic policy is to be discerned after his death.

Egeria. By Lily Thicknesse. (Hurst & Blackett.)

Frederick. By Mrs. L. B. Walford. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

The C Major of Life. By Havering Bowcher. (Elkin Mathews.)

The Romance of Judge Ketchum. By Horace Annesley Vachell. (Bentley.)

Herbert Vanlennert. By C. F. Keary. (Heinemann.)

A Darn on a Blue Stocking. By G. G. Chatterton. (Bellairs.)

Sleeping Fires. By George Gissing. (Fisher Unwin.)

If Egeria, as there seems reason to suppose is Miss Thicknesse's first novel, very hearty congratulation is her due. There is only one serious fault to be found with the book; and that concerns the way in which Nancy Middleton is sprung upon the reader when, and only when, she is urgently required to fall in love with Mark Bayard. She thus appears, like a revolving light, or a postman, or any other automaton, branded with a mission, to disappear when that is fulfilled. Surely art required some hint of her existence earlier. In all other respects the story deserves unqualified praise. Its central idea seems to be the influence, not necessarily good or bad, but the mere actual personal influence, of men and women on each other. It is at the Eights at Oxford that Mark Bayard first meets Egeria, whose unobtruded and more than half noble character and irresistible magnetic attraction are made very tangible. She is married, but has not lived with her husband for years. A wild struggle ensues between Mark's upright integrity and that part in every man which women like Egeria play on. Needless to tell the result. While yet under her spell Mark meets Jocelyn Wraye in Italy, and Jocelyn is already engaged to be married. Mark's real story then begins. The manner in which the different and vividly distinct personalities are given, with their changes of mental and emotional attitude, is excellent, even admirable. Mark's brave career will be followed to the end by anyone who reads the first chapter. He is one of those heroes who fall but cannot stay down, who long to rise, to lead the highest life, but never for one moment lapse into priggishness.

As once before, in Mr. Smith, so now in Frederick, Mrs. Walford has justified herself in choosing a hero whom the average author, and also many others, would have passed by as quite unworthy of dissection. Frederick is a country gentleman of a truly gentle type, kind to everybody, devoted to sport, immensely interested in all the little concerns of his neighbours, and beloved and indulged by his neighbours in return. First he was looked after by his father; now he is looked after by his elder brother, Sir William; he has no responsibilities; nobody expects anything from him but his unfailing good-humoured acquiescence in life; and so he remains, at nearly forty, just the sweetest-natured and best-behaved child anybody ever met. But into his placid existence there come, all on a sudden, Aline Carey, smarting under a thwarted love affair, and her scheming cousin, the barrister, Horace Carey. The characters of these three, and their action and re-action on one another, are presented with all the verisimilitude of Mrs. Walford's facile style, just tipped with humour as of old. Real life and real love dawn on Frederick, Aline discovers how over-hastily she had thought she loved, and Horace—he discovers several unpleasant things. This book, with Mr. Smith and The Baby's Grandmother, stand out from the rest of Mrs. Walford's work on a height apart.

The C Major of Life, though it contains barely a hint of any larger meaning than belongs to the ordinary romance, is yet not ordinary. At first one supposes it to be the history of two people who appear in the first chapter; then one finds it to be the love-story of a great musician; and then, at the end, one is called on to breathe the rarer air, and adjust one's mental vision to the larger horizon, of universal brotherhood. Arnold, the musician, the development of whose character from his rustic origin to his final social and artistic heights has been so interesting, has no share in the conclusion. He is simply dropped. But in spite of this lack of unity the book attracts, because of a certain quality of unusualness which it has; and here and there distinctly good things are to be found in it.

It is true that the heroes of "the author of Miss Molly," enshrined in that writer's present book, have monotonously smooth heads, and are too much addicted to kneeling to kiss the heroines' hands in the self-same manner, time, and place; and that the sunlight too inevitably brings out red lights in those heroines' hair. But it is also true that they all—heroes and heroines alike—have a subtle and delicate charm of their own, and that "the author of Miss Molly" well understands the working of certain women's minds and hearts, and has moreover an appreciable and individual grace in telling her stories. Particular parts of "Dorothea," for instance, are fragrant of the Swiss meadows, though it is a pity that the writer allows herself to adopt in this sketch the timeworn artifice of reporting her hero dead at the war, when every reader worth his salt knows it is only a matter of pages till he meets him again alive and well. "Arabia Petraea" is bright and more incisive. "Felicity Brooke" is a charming though slight presentment of a courageous and warm-hearted young girl.

"Favor," "wilted," and one or two other unfailing signs, prepare the astute reader to see The Romance of Judge Ketchum transplanted to the States from its birthplace in Tantallon Castle, Scotland. And as soon as American ground is touched the story becomes real. Mamie Tantallon, the idealising heroine, and the ordinary English and Scottish gentlepeople of the earlier part of it, leave the reader only half convinced. The women of the book are altogether the least satisfactory persons in it. But Judge Ketchum himself, with his shrewd philosophy, his pride and humility, his humour, and that uprightness which allows him to pick off a man when he thinks it necessary, is a very real and living person, and brings vigour into the story with his first word. As for the plot, it is a very ordinary one of a question of heirship, and some amount of mistaken love-making.

Miss Leda Law's book appears to be an instance of talent misapplied. Had she taken counsel with herself to write a clean story, she might perhaps have produced one that would have been worth reading. But she seems to have thought that a certain popular taste required a very different kind of thing, and accordingly among her men and women—most of them titled beings—she has scattered immorality broadcast. Not only are the acknowledged sinners bad, but the apparently virtuous and irreproachable are made to fall. If in this direction the writer of this unpleasant book looked for success she was mistaken, and she will miss her aim. The day of such books is drawing to an end, and a purer taste is reasserting itself. The leading idea of And the World Saith would seem to be that the woman who longs to sin, and refrains through cowardice and not through virtue, is a poorer kind of creature than the woman who bravely sins and takes the consequences. This is in some measure true, but there was no need for 360 unsavoury pages to state the thesis. Have we not Browning's "The Statue and the Bust"?

Endless people throng the mazy ways of Mr. Keary's Herbert Vanlennert, many of them, it must be confessed, entirely unnecessary to the story. For a story is not like life: one is not compelled to meet all the uninteresting and reduplicated relatives of one's friends. And over and above the unnecessary persons, Mr. Keary indulges in many unnecessary details and facts. For instance, Herbert and his last love go to church. The organ is played, and this paragraph is interpolated: "Both organ and choir were as fine as was commensurate with the size of the little church." This is unfortunate; as the essential parts of the book contain some good writing, some incidents out of the common, and shrewd observation of men and manners.

Valencia Arbuthnot, in A Darn on a Blue-Stocking, tired of the ease and comfort of her ancestral home, transplanted herself, her silks, furs, and furniture, to a London lodging, there to study art and conquer fame. In this London lodging there lodged also one William O'Brien, a journalist and a fascinating person. Like the March Hare, Valencia always had a tea-party going on, and Mr. O'Brien often assisted at this function. Later on the book develops more weight and self-respect, so to speak; and the end, though not quite expected, is far truer to life than a more satisfying one might have been.

Last, but not least, comes Mr. George Gissing's Sleeping Fires. In the "most pellucid air," and among the joyous gods of Greece, Mr. Gissing has thrown off the pessimism and absorption in the more sordid side of life which one has learnt to associate with his name. Throughout this "Autonym" volume there is a note of hope, of acquiescence in the higher destiny of man and man's power to attain it if he only will; and the end is a triumphant proclamation of the gospel of joy. "Health and joy," says Langley, the hero, "it is what life demands of us." He and Agnes Revill have sorrows and shame in their past; and this is the answer he makes to her faithfulness to them, and her shrinking from the happiness that offers itself. The three men who occupy the first half of the book are an admirable play of character—the pedant, out of touch with life already in his middle age; the boy, full of fine enthusiasm and chivalry; and Langley, the half-wearied but still young man of the world, to whom comes all unexpectedly a second youth. As always, Mr. Gissing gives every thought its fitting word, every motive its appropriate act, and every act its inevitable consequences.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

SOME COUNTRY BOOKS.

Outdoor Life in England. By Major A. T. Fisher. (Bentley.) This is one of the many popular books of recent years on native birds and animals which are written in such a genial vein as almost to disarm the critic. Otherwise he would say of this volume that it contains nothing new, and need never have been born into the world of books. It does not record the exact observations of a naturalist. It has little to do with sport or adventure; and yet, like the native brown-clad songsters, it soothes and pleases as it prattles of beasts and birds and flowers. No one can accuse the author of want of appreciation where country sights and sounds are concerned; but the style of the book is unattractive, and its want of definite statement detracts from its value. What, for instance, is the use of such a paragraph as this?

"It has been stated that rabbits are not indigenous to Great Britain [they were Roman importations]; but it is so many centuries since they were imported, and they have taken so readily to us, and thriven so remarkably well, that I think we may regard them as truly British."

Again, Major Fisher states that the wheatear is a resident bird. It is just the other way; the wheatear comes to England in March—it is the late Laureate's "sea-blue bird of March"—and leaves with the greatest regularity in early autumn. In treating of the nightjar, nothing is said of its curious habit of resting lengthways on a bough, or of the cracking noises which it is supposed to produce by its wings. Milton would not know his own words in Major Fisher's citation, "fresh fields and pastures new." On the other hand, all lovers of birds must applaud him for showing up a pseudo-sportsman who is said last season to have destroyed near Adderbury no fewer than eighty-five kingfishers, "under the ridiculous pretext of preserving a trout stream." Major Fisher's table of the British bats is useful, though the scientific knowledge of the British fauna generally has risen high above Major Fisher's level.

Vegetable Culture: a Primer for Amateurs, Cottagers, and Allotment-Holders. By A. Dean. Edited by J. Wright. (Macmillans.) The highest praise to give this sensible primer is to say that its terse directions and freedom from fine language answer to its professions. No better book could be given to men who have attended the lectures of County Councils on Gardening. Attention is carefully directed to those comparatively new industries which open a prospect of profit to small gardeners: such as tomatoes, mushrooms, Chinese artichokes, sea-kale, and the like. Salsify is seldom seen in a cottage garden; but it is easily grown, and would find a ready market. The plan of planting the main crop of potatoes in November is not named here; and yet it largely preserves a crop from disease and keeps it from frost, which many cottagers, with their limited accommodation, find difficult. This little book ends, after teaching how to grow all our vegetables and herbs, with a few useful pages on showing vegetables and the best modes of arranging them. A few illustrations render the volume more complete.

IN connexion with the Society for Checking the Abuses of Public Advertising—which held its annual meeting the other day under cheerful and hopeful circumstances, on the whole—a paper has been prepared ("hastily," he says) by the hon. secretary, Mr. Richardson Evans, and this is worthy of securing thoughtful perusal. "Different temperaments," says the author, "appear to be unequally affected by the various forms of advertising disfigurements"; and in his paper he deals with many of its forms, with practical suggestions for their abatement. He remarks, first, how in so many social questions it is an improvement in public feeling that leads gradually to practical legislation. In Italy, as he reminds us, regard for animals is laughed at as "impracticable sentimentality," while with ourselves it is accepted now as a fundamental instinct. Again, as to hygiene, wisacres, fifty years ago, even here in England, declared that England could not stand "dictation"—or, really, regulation—in such matters; and now England stands it quite comfortably. From such premises it may fairly be argued that an influential, useful future lies before the society which seeks to make impossible the hideousness of the street and the foul suggestions of the lane and field. The conditions of success, in Mr. Evans's judgment—and this our own readers, as we think, will do most well to remember—are to base every claim for legislative or administrative relief on broad public grounds; "to assert as a dogma of elementary common-sense that the protection of the amenities of aspect in our country is a public interest," in the same sense—though, of course, not in the same degree—as the defence of our shores against invading enemies. And excellently does Mr. Evans add that, "to help us in securing acceptance for this neglected truism," we have the circumstance that every year enormous sums are spent by the State in maintaining museums and picture galleries, in providing parks and gardens, and in endeavouring at least to secure architectural effect in our public buildings. The fact is, the society of which Mr. Evans would appear to be the life and soul is finding all around—and in some unexpected places—people who recognise generally that, on the whole, its aims are reasonable, and should be aided towards a slow and sure accomplishment.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. JOHN LANE announces a more ambitious book than any that has yet issued from the Bodley Head. This is a popular edition of The Compleat Angler, edited by Mr. Richard Le Gallienne, with illustrations by Mr. Edmund H. New. The text will be that of 1676, the last that received the supervision of Walton himself, and the first that included the second part by Charles Cotton. Mr. Le Gallienne will supply biographies of Walton and Cotton, and also notes elucidating local and contemporary allusions. There will be in all about two hundred drawings by Mr. New, who has qualified himself for topographical illustration by visiting all the spots associated with the name of Izaak Walton, from Stafford, where he was born, to Winchester, where he lies buried. He has also followed him along the River Lea and down the valley of the Dove. The mode of publication is in twelve shilling parts, the first of which will be ready in March.

THE next issue in Mr. David Nutt's series of "Tudor Translations," under the editorship of Mr. W. E. Henley, will be a reprint of Shelton's translation of Don Quixote, from the original editions of 1612 and 1620. Each Part will form two volumes, to be issued in pairs—the first in April, the second in July, with introductions by Mr. James Fitzmaurice-Kelly.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON announce a biography of the late Sir Arthur Blackwood, chief secretary of the Post Office, compiled by a friend and edited by his widow. It will be in one volume, with three portraits.

THE next volume in Mr. T. Fisher Unwin's series of "The Story of the Nations" will be Canada, by Dr. J. G. Bourinot, chief clerk of the House of Commons at Ottawa. Special attention will be devoted to the French aspects of Canadian history; and the illustrations will include some from sources not generally accessible.

MR. CHARLES GODFREY LELAND has a new book in the press, to be entitled A Manual of Mending and Repairing, which undertakes to give practical advice for restoring all sorts of old and broken things—such as furniture, crockery, books, pictures, clothes, shoes, &c. In brief, it aims at abolishing the alternative policy of "ending." The book will be published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

THE new volume in Mr. Lane's "Mayfair Set" will be The Feasts of Autolycus: the Diary of a Greedy Woman, by Mrs. Elizabeth Robins Pennell. It consists of a selection from Mrs. Pennell's series of articles which have been appearing in the "Autolycus" column of the Pall Mall Gazette—the last only a fortnight ago. The book will have a title-page designed by Mr. Patten Wilson.

MRS. BURNETT's new novel, A Lady of Quality, will be issued by Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co., at the end of next week, simultaneously with its publication by Messrs. Scribner in the United States. We understand that the movement of the story takes place in the time of Queen Anne.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. will publish shortly a new story by Marie Corelli, under the title of The Mighty Atom. The original intention was to include this book in Messrs. Hutchinson's "Zeit-Geist Library"; but, as it has expanded to more than double the length required for that series, it will now be issued as a separate volume.

MISS FLORENCE MARRYAT has nearly ready for publication a new novel, dealing with spiritualism, which will be issued through Messrs. Hutchinson & Co., in one volume, under the title of The Strange Transfiguration of Hannah Stubbs.

IN consequence of the good reception of their "Cheapest Books in the World," Messrs. Bliss, Sands & Foster have decided to issue a new series of "Classical Reprints," of which the artistic binding and typography will form distinctive features. The first volume, to appear next week, is a facsimile reprint of the 1843 edition of The Vicar of Wakefield, with the whole of the thirty-two illustrations by Mulready. The second volume, a verbatim reprint of the first edition of Gulliver's Travels, will be published early in March.

AMONG other forthcoming works from the same firm is a new novel by Gabriel Setoun, the author of "Sunshine and Haar" and "Barnraig, entitled Robert Urquhart; and a new novel by the author of "Green Tea."

MR. J. B. ASKEW has for some time past been at work collecting material for a work which professes to contain the views on both sides with respect to the more prominent political and social problems of the day; and these he has arranged under topical heads. The book, to be published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co., will form a volume of 300 pages, with a full index.

THE "Stratford-on-Avon Shakspeare," to be issued by George Newnes & Co., in twelve monthly volumes, aims at giving an accurate text of the complete works, in bold type, with a glossary of obsolete words and phrases, in a form suitable alike for the bookshelf and the pocket. The text will conform as closely as possible to that of the early Quartos and Folios, only such emendations being admitted as have been adopted by a consensus of Shaksperian scholars.

A BOOK entitled George Fox and the Quaker Testimony, by Mr. Henry Deacon, will be published at an early date by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MESSRS. MENTZ, KENNER, & GELBERG, of Charterhouse-street, announce the following: In our Hours of Ease, by F. Frankfort Moore; The Great Jester: being some Jests of Fate, by Morley Roberts; and A Cumberland Tragedy, by Percy Russell.

MR. ROBERT MCCLURE, of Glasgow, has in the press an Easy Guide to the Practice of Shorthand, based on Taylor's "loop" system without shading.

THE first monthly part of the popular issue of British Battles on Land and Sea, to be issued on February 26, will contain an account of recent battles from 1875 to 1879, with a portrait of Lord Wolsley as frontispiece.

THE Sunday School Union will shortly publish Stories of the Far West, by Mr. Frank Mundell; and also Heroines of Daily Life, the first volume in a new series for girls, by the same author.

THE second edition being exhausted, Messrs. Ward, Lock & Bowden are about to publish a third edition of Mr. Mackenzie Bell's Spring's Immortality, and Other Poems. The author has written a new Prefatory Note, and has considerably revised the patriotic poem entitled "The Taking of the Flag."

MR. CHARLES HANNAN'S Chinese novel A Swallow's Wing, which has lately been entirely out of print in both the English and American editions, will be re-issued shortly by Messrs. Jarrold & Sons in an illustrated form.

THE three following gentlemen have been elected by the committee to the Athenaeum Club: Sir Arthur Lawrence Haliburton, Mr. Rowland E. Prothero, and Mr. Henry Woods, R.A.

AT the South Place Institute, on Sunday next, at 4 p.m., Sir Alfred Lyall will deliver a lecture on "Northern India."

DURING the three last days of next week, Messrs. Sotheby will be engaged in selling a number of autographs from different collections. There is included a series of sign manuals of European sovereigns, and political letters addressed by Chatham to Lord Holderness. But the chief attraction is the large proportion of letters from literary persons, such as Jane Austen, Charlotte Brontë, Mrs. Browning and her husband, Tennyson, and Rossetti.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE March number of Blackwood's will contain a complete historical romance by Mrs. Oliphant, founded on the diversion of Kellie from the Fife branch of the Oliphant family. It is entitled "The Heirs of Kellie, an Episode of Family History." Mr. Neil Munro also contributes to the number another of his Celtic sketches, entitled "The Fell Serjeant."

THE March number of Cosmopolis will contain an article on Lord Leighton, by Mr. George Moore; and one on Paul Verlaine, by Mlle. Blaze de Bury.

DR. RUTHERFORD, secretary to the Chartered Company in South Africa and member for Kimberley in the Cape Legislative Assembly, will contribute a paper to the forthcoming number of the New Review, on the causes that have hindered the continuous development of South Africa.

Cassell's Magazine for March will contain an article upon "The Duke of Devonshire's Homes," written by Mr. Frederick Dolman, and illustrated from photographs. The same number will contain complete stories by Mr. D. H. Parry, Mr. C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne, and Mr. Andrew Home.

THE first article in the March number of the Quiver will be a sketch of life in Chelsea Hospital by the Rev. Fred. Hastings, who is well known to the old pensioners. Miss Sparrow will have a paper on "Men Martyrs"; and the Rev. Dr. Parker of the City Temple, Dean Chadwick of Armagh, Prof. Gordon Blaikie of Edinburgh, the Rev. A. B. Boyd Carpenter, and Dr. Hiles Hitchens are among the other contributors.

A NEW magazine is to be commenced in May, under the editorship of Dr. Lunn, of Endsleigh-gardens, entirely devoted to travel and allied subjects. It will contain illustrated articles on mountaineering, cycling abroad and at home, pedestrian, boating, and riding tours, the great cathedrals of the world, new countries as spheres for the adventurous tourist, and triumphs of engineering, besides short stories, notes, and queries.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

CAMBRIDGE, though later to begin than Oxford, will have the first word on the burning question of granting degrees to women. On Wednesday next, a report of Council on the subject, dated as recently as February 17, will be submitted to the Senate for discussion. The report merely summarises the memorials that have been presented—one by 2088 members of the Senate, another by 1172 students of Girton and Newnham, and a third by 164 head mistresses—and proposes the appointment of a syndicate

"to consider what further rights or privileges (if any) should be granted to women students by the University; and whether women should be made admissible to degrees, and if so, to what degrees, on what conditions, and with what restrictions (if any)."

IN Convocation at Oxford, on Tuesday next, it will be proposed to confer the degree of M.A., "by decree of the house," upon Dr. James A. H. Murray, editor-in-chief of the New English Dictionary. Dr. Murray is already an honorary M.A. of the university; but the decree will give him the complete jus suffragii.

THE Senatus Academicus of St. Andrews University has resolved to confer the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws upon the Rev. Andrew Clark, editor of so many volumes for the Oxford Historical Society; Prof. Henry Jones, of Glasgow; and Prof. George Pirie, of Aberdeen; also the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity upon the Rev. John Watson, of Liverpool ("Ian Maclaren").

THE council of University College, London, have resolved to fill the chair of Persian, which has been vacant for some time. Prof. Rieu, now at Cambridge, was professor of both Arabic and Persian; it is in the former capacity only that Mr. S. A. Strong was appointed his successor.

BOTH Oxford and Cambridge have recently resolved to continue the scholarships which they have for some time past maintained in connexion with Dr. Dohrn's zoological station at Naples.

AT the meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, to be held next Monday in the Chemical University Laboratory, Prof. Dewar has promised to show some experiments on liquid air.

THE thanks of the University of Cambridge have been formally voted to the Grand Duke of Hesse and Prince Henry of Prussia, for their present of the skeleton of a wild boar to the Zoological Museum.

SIR HERBERT OAKELEY has received the diploma of Doctor of Music from the University of Adelaide.

THE inaugural lecture, on "Liberty and Authority in Matters of Taste," which Mr. W. J. Courthope delivered at Oxford last Saturday as professor of poetry, is published as a pamphlet by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. We must be content to quote the following passage, as of practical moment:

"A great opportunity of advancing in this direction [the strengthening of the principle of authority in matters of taste] seems to be offered by the foundation of the new Oxford School of English Language and Literature. For while the ancient classics must always remain our primal authority in determining what are the principles of good taste, it is in the classics of our own country that we can best study the manner in which these principles have been and should be applied. The tablets of the English School are still almost a blank: it will depend upon the first teachers and examiners what shall be written in them. You may make it a genuine school of taste, which shall show the student what is the true standard of excellence in English writing, and how he may measure for himself the aberrations of eccentric genius. . . . In such a school the exact study of language will be, as it is in Literas Humaniores, of the highest value in helping to unlock the secrets of thought, and in exhibiting the orderly development of the laws of taste and harmony. Language is the instrument of thought, and, like the winged sandals of Mercury, it may aid the mind to mount into the higher regions of thought and imagination. But it would be an error to take Mercury's sandals as the source of his divinity; and something of the kind would happen, if, as might be done in the English School, the study of language were to be allowed to predominate over the study of literature. The study of language in itself is, like every branch of science, of the highest intellectual interest. But were it to be raised above literature, or even studied apart from literature, I venture to say that you would be wasting an unequalled opportunity; for you would be introducing a foreign educational principle, which can never acclimatise itself in the genius of England and Oxford. You might under such conditions get a school of archaeological research, which would doubtless be of use and interest to the special student; but you would not get, what you may still get, a school capable of exercising a natural influence in the discipline of English taste."

We do not absolutely agree with this—it seems somewhat to ignore the historical development of literature as the expression of contemporary life and thought—but it cannot be doubted that it needed saying, and has been well said.

TRANSLATION.

HESIOD—"WORKS AND DAYS," 504-525.

BEWARE the Wins-god's month, when vats all emptied are, and when Keen frosts the cattle well-nigh flay. Yea! dire the days are then.
Then through the far-off land of Thrace, famed nurse of steeds, the blast
The bleak North breeds comes sweeping down across the watery waste,
The which it lifts in tumbling heaps, and bursting on our shore,
Wakes up within the ancient woods the long resounding roar;
And crashing down before its might in many a mountain-glade
Proned on the bounteous earth stout pines and towering oaks are laid.
The forest-things with fur on end clap close their bushy tails
Betwixt their thighs; but little now the rough grown coat avails
To shield them in this bitter time: nor does the bullock's hide Him better serve against the storm, its fury to abide.
The lean goat, too, it pinches sore for all its shaggy hair;
Howbeit less dolefully the flocks with close-piled fleeces fare.
This blustering North wind fastens on the grey-beard's withered age,
And bends him double. Scarce the while racks aught of all its rage
The tender girl safe still at home beneath her mother's care, Naught knowing of love's gold-dight Queen, and what her doings are.
She bathes and then anoints with oil her smooth soft skin and white,
And soundly in her maiden bed sleeps through the wintry night,
What time the cuttle-fish its toes doth gnaw for very want,
And cheer in poor men's fireless homes is miserably scant.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

ONE or two noticeable short stories in Chapman's Magazine make the February number worthy of especial comment. Mr. Norris, of course, always writes like a gentleman, and often like a humorist; and "Scandalous Martha" is by no means without point. Then, again, a writer (sex not indicated, and when that is so we surmise always a woman) provides a tale called "Strawberry Leaves," which shows how at a country house a poor relation of the hostess angled successfully for a Duke. The end—always the real crux of the second-rate story writer—is badly done, for Lena could not have talked to the Duke as if Lady Grantully (with whom he had had an affair long ago) did not concern him; for she had seen him devoted to her, and as if compelled to be, only on the previous evening. The tale ends lamely therefore; yet it is a good superficial sketch of the world it aims to represent. Again, there is a story, and a more serious one, by Mr. Richard Pryce, called "A Girl of Lambeth," in which, by an unnecessary and untrue pessimism, just in a touch or two—as where the street organ "tells its blatant lie of the joy of life"—we are reminded of some East-End narratives which had their cleverness, and have lived their day, but which were puffed unduly by a little journalistic clique, a year or so ago. But Mr. Pryce is no mere imitator; he is essentially himself, and he can be not only "realistic" but decidedly touching. The gladness of the girl at the approaching advent of a child is unconventional, and probably true. Furthermore, Mr. Pryce has the courage not to confine himself to narrative. Like Mr. Wedmore, in one at least of his short stories—that about the Aerated Bread Girl in English Episodes—he makes a young woman of what is called the lower classes talk, and talk at length, instead of merely describing her. And that, we cannot but consider, is a difficult feat.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SONG OF WADE.

King's College, Cambridge: Feb. 17, 1896.

In view of Mr. Jannaris's conjectural reading of the context of the fragment of Wade, so happily recognised and elucidated by Mr. Gollancz ten days ago, I should like to tell the small public who are interested in such matters exactly what the text of the MS. is. I will copy a few of the lines which precede the passage actually in question:

"humiliatus ÷ [=est] primus parens noster qui cum dominus totius mundi efficeretur ante peccatum et in [underlined for erasure] omnibus que in mundo erant dominaretur post peccatum vero a villi vermiculo editus a pulce sine ridiculo ee minime potuit defendere. Qui similis fuit deo ante peccatum, post peccatum factus ÷ [est] dissimilis, quia hoc [P] duce rosa nunquam usitatur in saluocam. Adā 13 de hoīe . fact' ÷ sq . [quasi] nō hō . n tām adā 33 oms 'fe fūt . q . nō homines. Ita q. drō possant cū Wade."

The sense is: "Adam, from being a man, became, as it were, not a man; nor only Adam, but almost all men become, as it were, not men. So that they can say with Wade," &c. The writer means that Adam, who was made in the image of God, lost that image—in virtue of which he was truly homo—by his sin; and so do his descendants. And, after the quotation from Wade, he proceeds to say that nowadays some men—e.g., tyrants—are wolves, while others imitate serpents, lions, and foxes.

It is clear that the reading offered by your correspondent will not fit with the MS. (which he has had no opportunity of seeing, while I write with it before me); and I will only add that I do not quite see how he proposes to translate his opening words. In the form communicated to the Athenaeum of February 15, these are "Adam a deo humili est factus." Is this to be rendered: "Adam was made by God on the ground"? This totally fails to give a point d'appui for the quotation from Wade; and yet I cannot see any other possible rendering—not, surely, "Adam was made by God of (= out of) earth"?

I notice in the same sermon an anecdote of Hugo de Gurnai being pardoned by a king of France.

MONTAGUE RHODES JAMES.

UNIVERSITY DEGREES FOR WOMEN.

University College, Oxford: February, 1896.

As one who signed the memorial in favour of granting an Oxford degree to women students, allow me to say a few words in the ACADEMY as to the conditions under which I should personally prefer to see this reform carried out.

Hitherto female students from the Holloway College and elsewhere have submitted themselves—I believe not without success—for the different examinations to which we in Oxford admitted women. Surely it would be a great injustice if, in placing the coping-stone on the Oxford scheme of female education, we excluded from the benefits accorded all women's colleges except those situated in Oxford.

No one, I think, will accuse me of any want of sympathy with the Oxford colleges for female students, which have already done such admirable work. I am sure they will have no reason to complain, if they continue to have to compete for Oxford honours with similar institutions elsewhere.

Moreover, by not insisting on residence in Oxford as a condition of taking a degree for women, the University will indirectly retain considerable control over the curriculum of women's colleges outside Oxford. I am sufficiently convinced that my University is better able to mould female education all over England than, for instance, the London or Victoria Universities; and I shall, therefore, regret it if we forfeit much of our influence by confining it to institutions located in Oxford.

I am whole-hearted in my desire that any system of teaching and examination which long use has proved to be of value for men should be extended to women; and I cannot here agree with my friend Prof. Gardner's view, as expressed in the Times, that music, drawing, and French are good for women, but that Latin, Greek, and mathematics are bad. Real aptitude for music and drawing is just as rare among women as real aptitude for Greek and mathematics. There is nothing in the study of the classics and mathematics which unfits them to be the material of female education; nor is there anything in modern languages or in music or drawing to render them specially suitable; and the old idea that there is has, in times gone by, been responsible for much annoyance of eyes and ears. I should, in fact, hail with delight the sight of one or two thousand women reading for our Oxford examinations, but I do not wish to see them all pursuing their studies in Oxford. Five hundred of them there is a manageable number. I should prefer that the other fifteen hundred diffused themselves over the Holloway and Bedford Colleges and elsewhere.

If residence be dispensed with, all fear of women's further advancement in University privileges beyond the B.A. or any other degree granted to them will be removed.

FRED. C. CONYBEARE.

"SHREW" AND "BESHREW."

London: Jan. 25, 1896.

In his Lectures on Celtic Heathendom, Prof. Rhys has the following observations on the Welsh superstition of "the crop-tailed black sow" (yr huch ddu gwta):

"The habit of celebrating Nos Galan-gassaf in Wales by lighting bonfires on the hills is probably not yet extinct; and, within the memory of men still living, those who assisted at the bonfires used to wait till the last spark was out, when, unlike Diarmait, the whole company would suddenly take to their heels, shouting at the top of their voices, 'The cropped black sow seize the hind-most!' . . . In the upper part of the tale of the Dee the doggerel takes the following form: 'A cutty black sow On every stile Spinning and carding Each November-eve'; . . . and we have it again in the corresponding but less specific rhyme from my native part of North Cardiganshire, which runs thus: 'On November-eve A bogie on every stile.'" (Celtic Heathendom, pp. 515, 516.)

The author adds a note at the end of the work (p. 675): "I find that the Huch ddu gwta is also remembered in Anglesey."

There is a very interesting account of some of the customs connected with this superstition in Y Geninen for July, 1889 (vol. vii., p. 200). It was furnished by "H. Hughes, Cerrig y Drudion," in response to an inquiry made by Prof. Rhys. If I may trust an impression rather than a distinct recollection, the Carmarthenshire term for the "bogie" on the stile is bwei and not bwbach. My recollection of the usual sequel to the bonfire, however, is vivid enough, for I have been more than once the last at the stile (only it was not a stile, but a gate).

In the course of some recent excursions into the regions of Folk-lore, among much interesting matter that I noted, I came across "Antient Customs in Games used by Boys and Girls, merily sett out in Verse, by Randle Holme (the second)," as quoted in Baines's History of Lancashire.

Here are the first and the last four lines:

"Any they dare chalenge for to throw the sledge . . .
At shrove-groate, venter-poynte, or cross and pile
At beshrew him that's last at any stile
At leaping over a Christmas bonfire
Or at the drawinge dame out of the myer."

The third line from the end evidently refers to the same custom as that described by Prof. Rhys.

Obscure as the history of the Welsh "crop-tailed black sow" is, that of the English "shrew" is still more so. The Encyclopaedic Dictionary has—

"Shrew . . . A.S. screawa = shrew-mouse, prob. orig. = the biter, and hence transferred to a scolding or churlish person. Originally used of both sexes, and implying a graver charge than is now involved in the word."

No illustrative instances of a superstitious meaning are given. Under "shrew-ash" and "shrew-struck," however, we do find some help from Gilbert White's Selborne, pt. ii., ch. xxvii.; and lett. xxviii. (Note). The latter is as follows:

"When a horse in the fields happened to be suddenly seized with anything like a numbness in his legs, he was immediately judged by the old persons to be either planet-struck or shrew-struck. The mode of cure they prescribed, and which they considered in all cases infallible, was to drag the animal through a piece of bramble that grew at both ends."

Under "beshrew" the New English Dictionary does not refer to the custom mentioned by Randle Holme. I am almost afraid to suggest that as "shrew" is a difficult word to pronounce, it may have been, on the Welsh border, altered into a form easily confounded with "sow." Whatever the original "shrew" may have been, one can scarcely imagine any creature in the form of a sow squatting on a stile.

There is another mysterious black being figuring in Welsh legendary lore—yr Afagddu I have suggested to Prof. Rhys that this is but another form of yr afanc ddu (the black dwarf, rather than the black beaver).

J. P. OWEN.

THE MINORITES ON MOUNT SION IN THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.

London: Jan. 31, 1896.

Ludolph von Suchem, who wrote in 1350 his account of his travels in the Holy Land, when describing the monastery on Mount Sion, states that in it

"now dwell Minorite Brethren who in my time were amply furnished with necessities by Queen Sancia, the wife of King Robert."

Dr. F. Deycks thought the king in question must have been either Charles Robert of Anjou, King of Hungary, or Robert Bruce, King of Scotland, though it is difficult to conceive what could have induced the German writer to make either of these random guesses. The King of Hungary had three wives, but not one of them bore the name of Sancia. They were in chronological order—Mary, Beatrice, and Elizabeth (Thwroczi's Chron. Hungarice, part ii., chapters 91 and 92). The wives of Robert the Bruce on the other hand, were Isabella of Mar and Elisabeth de Burg (see the Dictionary of National Biography).

Mr. Aubrey Stewart, the editor and translator of Suchem's "Description of the Holy Land" in part No. 27 of the Palestine Pilgrims Text Society's publications, is nearer the truth when stating that, after reading Fabri's account (published by the same society), he is inclined to think that Ludolph meant Robert, King of Sicily and Jerusalem. For Raynaldus in his Annales Ecclesiast. records the fact that Queen Sancia, the wife of the aforesaid Robert, founded a monastery on Mount Sion in or about the year 1342, for twelve monks of the Minorite order, and three lay brethren to act as servants to the friars. In support of his statement the author reproduces the text of a letter addressed by Pope Clement VI. to the "Supreme Praefect" of the "Franciscan family," dated Avignon "pridie kalend. Decemb., anno primo."

Robert died in January, 1343; his wife in 1345. Joan I. of Naples, their granddaughter, who followed the king on the throne, soon after her accession got into money difficulties, after having emptied the treasury and squandered the fortune collected by Robert for the purpose of reconquering Sicily from the Aragonese; and, judging by what Ludolph von Suchem states, the friars on Mount Sion had their allowance stopped in consequence.

LEWIS L. KROPP.

ON INFANT BAPTISM AND FOLK-LORE.

Bury St. Edmunds: Feb. 17, 1896.

Mr. Whitley Stokes's letter describing rites from various heathen quarters analogous to the baptism of infants as practised in the Christian Church will be of interest to students of comparative religion; but is not a more obvious origin of Christian infant baptism to be found in the Jewish rite of circumcision? I mean so far as the time of life is concerned at which the administration takes place.

Mr. Whitley Stokes increases the probability of the truth of his theory by stating that infant baptism began to be taken into the Christian system towards the end of the second century.

Two passages can, however, be adduced of a much earlier date, which, though not explicit statements of fact, are generally taken to imply the existence of infant baptism:

'Ορθόδοξοντα καὶ ἐξ ἑτῆς ἔχον δουλεύον ἀντὶ, καὶ οὐδὲν με ἡδίκησεν· καὶ πῶς δύναμαι βλασφημῆσαι τὸν βασιλέα μου, τὸν σώσαντά με; spoken by Polycarp to the heathen pro-consul, and recorded in the letter of the Smyrnaeans on the martyrdom of that saint (cap. 9).

Justin Martyr, writing in the middle of the second century, speaks of persons sixty and seventy years of age, οἱ ἐκ παιδῶν ἐμαρτυρήσαντες τῷ Χριστῷ. The passage and the inference based upon it may be seen in W. Wall's The History of Infant Baptism (Oxford, 1862, vol. i., p. 43).

Let me finish with a quotation from Duchesne:

"On me permettra de ne pas prendre au sérieux les systèmes imaginés dans ces derniers temps en Allemagne et en Angleterre, pour rattacher l'organisation des églises chrétiennes à celle des confréries païennes. L'idée que les premiers chrétiens aient pu chercher des modèles, pour quoi que ce soit, dans des institutions qu'ils avaient en horreur, n'est pas de nature à faire honneur aux têtes dans lesquelles elle peut entrer."

(Origines du Culte Chrétien, Paris, 1889, p. 10.)

F. E. WARREN.

Sheffield: Feb. 15, 1896.

Doubtless Mr. Whitley Stokes is right in saying that Christian infant baptism was originally a pagan rite of purification.

That it was such a rite in England is proved by the custom, still occasionally found in the Midland counties, of taking a plate of salt into church at baptism, the belief being that a child baptised near salt will be sure to go to heaven. Among the Norsemen it was usual to put salt into the mouth at baptism, and a cross-shaped saltcellar was used by them during the ceremony (see Vigfusson, Icelandic Dict., s.v. geifla, and p. 510). That salt was regarded as a purifier may be seen in the practice of preparing a mixture of salt and water, known in Derbyshire as "holy lymph," to take away the ill-luck which is supposed to be associated with a dead man's coat, &c. On this subject see my Household Tales and Traditional Remains (p. 86).

AN UNRECORDED ENGLISH VERB.

Oxford: Feb. 15, 1896.

In answer to Dr. Murray's query in the ACADEMY of to-day respecting possible cognates of the Old English verb dēcan, "to smear, daub, &c.," it may be worth while mentioning that in 1886 (cf. Paul und Braune's Beiträge, xii. 430) Prof. S. Bugge (whose attention had been drawn to it by Prof. Unger) pointed out that Bosworth-Toller's (ge)dēccan, "to cover," was incorrect, and that it should be (ge)dēcan, from an older **dōkjan*, to which, on the evidence of the three well-known instances of the word, he assigned the meaning "einweichen, imprägnieren," and further suggested the Lithuanian dažyti as a possible cognate: "es scheint mir möglich, dass ags. dēccan, 'einweichen,' aus **dōkjan* mit lit. dažyti, 'eintunken, eintauchen,' verwant ist." There is nothing either in the form or in the meaning of these words which militates against this relationship, even if we assign to the Old English verb, as, on the evidence of the later usage in Palladius, we certainly must, the meaning "smear, daub, plaster," rather than that of "soak."

Oxford: Feb. 17, 1896.

In the first of two letters with the above title in the ACADEMY of February 15, Dr. Murray has omitted to state that the whole of the information he gives about Old-English dēcan was derived from me.

Early in 1894 he came to me in great perplexity, asking how it was possible to connect the Old-English verb dēccan with German decken. I immediately opened my MS. Old-English dictionary, and pointed out to him that the supposed dēccan was really dēcan with a long e; I laid special stress on the fact that the vowel was accented in the MSS., a fact which could be known only to a specialist like myself. At his request I wrote out a full statement, giving the quotations from Ælfric's Homilies, as he himself did not possess the book. There must also be some mistake about the date of his first letter; as our interview took place on February 22, it is clear that his letter could not have been written in the preceding January.

The practice of decking oneself with borrowed philological plumes has become rife of late years. I write this letter in the hope of contributing to the abatement of the nuisance.

THE REV. JOHN OWEN.

London: Feb. 15, 1896.

After a careful enumeration of the published writings of the late Rev. John Owen, you close your very interesting obituary notice of this scholar with a suggestion that some of his contributions to The Edinburgh Review might with advantage be collected. It will doubtless interest you to hear that we have in the press a new work by the late Mr. Owen, the proofs of which he was revising at the time of his death. It is a comparative study of the "Prometheus Bound" of Aeschylus, the "Book of Job," the "Hamlet" of Shakspeare, the "Faust" of Goethe, and the "Wonder-Working Magician" of Calderon—from the author's well-known point of view. The book will appear under the title of Five Great Skeptical Dramas, within the course of the next few months.

SCIENCE.

"CAMBRIDGE GEOGRAPHICAL SERIES."—Ethnology. By A. H. Keane. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THIS able, learned, and in its way exhaustive treatise, is one of those books which are the despair of the reviewer. He knows not where to have it. How is he to treat so compact a mass of assorted information? He cannot give a résumé of a work which is itself a condensed and reasoned epitome of all that has been said, thought, and written upon a wide and extremely varied science. He cannot deal critically with what is itself a criticism of all the leading views already expressed on so vast a subject. He cannot pick out the plums, for the plums are few, this volume being designed rather for instruction than amusement. In default of all else, he must fain fall back upon mere general description.

Prof. Keane's book is the first systematic treatise on Ethnology as a whole that has appeared since the general acceptance of the evolutionary theory. He has made it worthy of the place it occupies. It is divided into two parts, the first of which deals with the fundamental ethnical problems, while the second is devoted to the establishment of an ethnical classification. The treatment of the first part is ample and satisfactory; the second part—more original and novel—seems to me to give by far the best division of the human species into varieties and sub-varieties, on a scientific biological basis, that has hitherto been attempted. I do not say there are not cases where one is disposed to query Prof. Keane's affiliations; but, taken as a whole, his grouping is the most lucid, philosophic, and natural plan yet proposed for this intricate labyrinthine maze of interlacing sub-species.

Our author, to begin with, possesses many great qualifications for the task he has set himself. His mind has grasp, acuteness, delicacy, logical faculty. He neither overlooks minute points, nor suffers them to obscure for him the larger issues. He is tolerably free from bias of any sort; where he shows a little, it is often in the opposite direction from that which one would expect: a philologist himself, for example, he is laudably jealous of the obtrusion of linguistic considerations into the domain of ethnology. He never jumps at conclusions as to race from mere facts of language. He is entirely free from the great Aryan superstition. If he shows himself at times just a little dogmatic, he stands, on the other hand, no dogmatic nonsense from others. When he puts his foot down, he lets one feel it. He will not away with Prof. Sayce's ipse dixit as to the impassability of the frontier between flection and agglutination; nor will he put up with "evolution with a jump" or any other of the illogical half-way houses which spread feather-beds to catch a falling supernaturalist. In one word, he approaches his subject fully equipped both as to knowledge of facts and as to faculty for arranging them: an evolutionary biologist, well aware of man's true place in the animal series; an ethnologist and philologist, amply provided with data for the work he has undertaken; a philosophic thinker, endowed with keen vision and a broad outlook upon nature, to assist him in his synthesis. Yet in some ways he recalls the Continental rather than the English school of men of science; and this peculiarity of style and manner is particularly noticeable both in his schematism and in his somewhat aggressive tone towards orthodox theology, which resembles more the French Voltairian's attitude towards the "men in black" than the conciliatory gliding over the thin ice to which we are accustomed in England.

Prof. Keane begins by distinguishing the spheres of ethnography and ethnology, the former being descriptive in character and engaged in collecting information about tribes and races, which the latter proceeds to classify and systematise. He then goes on to the various ethnological problems of the physical and mental evolution of man, the antiquity of the species, and the history and culture of palaeolithic, neolithic, and recent humanity. Here it is his duty to review the Cannstadt and Neanderthal questions, the fossil man of Calaveras County, and many other familiar acquaintances. Of all these parts, it must suffice to say that as brief summings-up of the known they can hardly be bettered, while as judicial and critical surveys of still moot points they seem to me almost always to arrive at the sober, just, and sensible conclusion. Where our author breaks a lance with Boyd-Dawkins or Sergi, his opponents come off with large rifts in their armour. His conception of the analogy between human evolution and that of other types is extremely clear. He neither overstates nor understates the value of the varieties. Nor is Prof. Keane afraid of pushing back the postulated anthropoid precursor to a point in the Miocene at least which would allow for the subsequent differentiation of the four great sub-species; he feels no timid doubts about the possibility of the mind of man being evolved by natural causes; he refuses to join in the common exaggeration of the gap between the lowest human and highest animal intelligence; and he brushes away with a broom of sound reasoning a vast deal of crude conjecture or unfounded assertion about seasonal migration, antiquity of mound-builders, Celtic origin of megalithic structures, and other antiquated geological or archaeological lumber. Sound common sense and a healthy absence of conservative prejudice are the keynotes of all this crowded introductory portion.

On the question of the specific unity of man Prof. Keane is a firm and reasoned monogenist. His arguments in favour of universal fertile miscegenation, in both prehistoric and historic time, are acute and convincing: physiologically, anatomically, and linguistically, he leaves the polygenists (if there are any) without a leg to stand upon. As to varietal diversity, he is clear and concise, and most often carries his reader with him. I think, however, he attaches a somewhat undue importance to the essential mental differences between races, and allows too little for the immediate effect of geographical position and other stimulants to progress. Have not the varying facilities for agriculture, for trade, and for navigation more to do with such differences as now exist than any primitive race characteristic? My own intercourse with negroes has certainly led me to a very different conclusion from that of our author's American authorities, who believe the pure-blooded African incapable of improvement, except by miscegenation. This is a subject much obscured in the United States by political and racial prejudice; it were to be wished that he would balance his judgment on the matter by enquiry of the officials in our West Indian colonies, where unmixed negroes have, I think, undoubtedly risen during the past half century.

The most interesting portion of the work, however, is the second part, which gives at length Prof. Keane's final conclusions upon the ramifications and interlacings of the human sub-species. On this subject he speaks as a first-hand authority of the highest rank. Our author starts with four main groups—Aethiopian, Mongolian, American, and Caucasian. These primary groups he derives, not from one another, but from a common precursor, now most nearly represented or approached, he believes, by the Negrito races. The details of his masterly classification it would be impossible to summarise; still more to criticise the reasons he gives for his various decisions. It is nothing less than a complete genealogical tree of humanity. Here and there, to be sure, one comes across an identification which gives one pause. It certainly seems a hard saying, for example, that the smooth or curly-haired Australian black is to be included among the negroes, and placed as a sub-division of the Aethiopian group along with the much more Melanesoid Tasmanians; while the Todas, Veddahs, and Ainus, who seem so like him, are to be reckoned far away among the darker Caucasians. Even allowing for the intermixture of blood in Australia which Prof. Keane admits, this is a difficult pill to swallow. And there are others no easier. Yet on the whole, I have not seen a classification so minute, so thoroughly carried out, so well reasoned, and so convincing. When one fails to agree, one is at least respectful. To have so far unravelled so tangled a skein seems in itself no small triumph. I do not doubt that subsequent ethnologists will show many gaps and correct many misconceptions in Prof. Keane's scheme; but I believe they will base their classifications upon his for many generations.

An error here and there would bear correction. The great Bacon's name was Francis, not Nicholas: M. Boucher de Perthes was not an Abbé: and why "à contra"?

I have touched upon only a few of the many aspects of this important work. To touch upon them all, one would need to be as much a master of the science as the author himself is. And such do not grow on every hedgerow.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A CONJECTURE IN OVID'S HEROIDES, IX. 93.

Trinity College, Dublin: Feb. 6, 1896.

"Quæque redundabat fecundo vulnere serpens Fertilis, et damnis dives ab ipse suis."

It will be admitted that redundabat, which usually means to "overflow," can only be applied to the Hydra by a very strong metaphor; but it is not only a strong one, it is quite unexampled. P, the great Parisian MS., has (prima manu) something like redulabat (the last two syllables certain). I now see that the true reading is to be deduced from this—a much handsomer reading in my opinion—namely, rebellabat. Rebellare is used by Pliny in a sense akin to that here demanded, of the growing of ailments after they have been apparently conquered; and, what is more important, Ovid himself uses it, in a closely parallel passage, of Achelous in his contest with Hercules, when, after making him describe how the river fought first as a man, then as a serpent, lastly as a bull, and was beaten in each shape, makes him say of the last metamorphosis: "tauro mutatus membra rebellò" (Met. ix. 81).

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE evening discourse at the Royal Institution next Friday will be delivered by Dr. John Murray, of the Challenger, on "Marine Organisms and their Conditions of Environment."

AT the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, to be held at Burlington-gardens on Monday next, Mr. St. George R. Littledale will give the first public account of his recent adventurous journey across Tibet from north to south.

IN connexion with the London Ethical Society, Mr. G. F. Stout, editor of Mind, will deliver a lecture on Sunday next, at Essex Hall, the Strand, on "Primitive Magic and Modern Science."

THE Ethnographical Survey Committee of the British Association would be glad to receive offers of assistance from persons capable of making the requisite measurements of individuals belonging to rural populations. The committee will supply instruments and full information. It is suggested that competent observers might find it interesting to occupy themselves during some part of the Easter vacation in this manner. Applications may be made to the hon. sec., Mr. E. Sidney Hartland, Highgarth, Gloucester.

WE quote the following from the Times:

"A paper by Lord Kelvin on the generation of longitudinal waves in ether was read at Thursday's meeting of the Royal Society. He described an arrangement for obtaining pressure disturbance through a considerable space of air, accompanied by a very small proportion of ordinary transverse waves. His apparatus would afford the means of exposing sensitive plates to these longitudinal vibrations and thus might assist in elucidating the nature of the Röntgen rays. A paper by Prof. J. J. Thomson was also read, relating to experiments from which he concludes that all substances when transmitting the Röntgen rays are conductors of electricity. A discussion followed the reading of these papers, in which details were given of many experiments on these X rays. Its general effect was, however, to show that, while many interesting points have been noted, the obscurity hanging over the subject has not been appreciably lightened. Considerable differences of opinion were manifest even upon the conditions of the Röntgen experiments. While some advocated the use of very powerful currents, others had been successful with relatively weak ones; and while some were in favour of regarding the phosphorescence of the glass as the efficient source of the rays, others ascribed them to the glow of the electrodes. A new turn was given to the discussion by Captain Abney, who ventured, amid some expressions of dissent, to doubt whether the action of the Röntgen rays on a sensitive plate could properly be described as photographic. He cited several facts which, in his opinion, excluded the theory of direct photographic action in any ordinary sense, and indicated some preference for the view that the Röntgen rays acted by first setting up phosphorescence of action of some unknown kind in the glass at the back of the sensitive film. This view was corroborated by an experiment described by Prof. Dewar upon platino-cyanide of ammonium at low temperatures. This salt, ordinarily fluorescent, only became phosphorescent at the temperature of liquid air. On being exposed to Röntgen rays instead of to ordinary light, while immersed in liquid air, it showed when the liquid air was poured off brilliant phosphorescence. This proved that, whatever might be the nature of the Röntgen rays, they were convertible into light rays affecting the human eye. A large number of experiments were also described by Prof. Dewar, showing that resistance to the passage of Röntgen rays increased with increase of atomic weight. Organic substances were all relatively transparent, following the carbon, oxygen, hydrogen, and nitrogen of which they are composed. Mere complexity of structure made no difference; but substitution products showed increasing opacity, in the order of the atomic weights of the combined chlorine, bromine, and iodine."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE Cambridge University Press has nearly ready for issue a comprehensive work on The Italic Dialects, by Prof. R. Seymour Conway, of Cardiff. It will be an edition of the remains of Oscan, Paelignian, Umbrian, and the minor dialects of ancient Italy, including all inscriptions yet discovered, with critical commentary; the dialectal forms recorded in Latin and Greek sources; the place names and personal names of all the dialect-areas verified and arranged; brief historical introductions to each section; a conspectus of Italic grammar—alphabets, accents, and syntax; a dictionary to all the dialects; and an appendix of explanatory notes to the longer inscriptions.

THE February number of the Classical Review (David Nutt) begins a tenth volume, and also (we believe) the tenth year of this valuable periodical, which has hardly received the support which it deserves. The thoroughness that marks it throughout may be seen from the index to the last volume, filling something like thirty pages. The new number contains an unusual proportion of original articles, as opposed to reviews; but they are not very easy to summarise. Mr. E. Poste discusses the Age Eponymoi, mentioned in Aristotle's "Constitution of Athens," elaborately supporting the explanation of Dr. Sandys against Mr. Gilbert's theory that they are indistinguishable from the Archon Eponymoi. Prof. G. S. Sale, of Otago, sends a new explanation of the word ἀντίπλοος used by Thucydides in his account of the strengthening of the Syracusan galleys. Mr. H. T. Johnston examines all the cases of rhyme and assonance to be found in the "Aeneid," with the object of proving that they are a means for harmoniously binding together his verses consciously adopted by the poet. Prof. A. S. Wilkins examines the credibility of the assertion of Barth (ob. 1658), that he possessed MS. material for his edition of the "Thebais" of Statius, which is no longer existent. Mr. W. M. Lindsay, basing himself upon a collation of readings printed in two former numbers, maintains that the light ink corrections (tertia manu) in the Florence MS. of Nonius are probably derived from the lost archetype of our existing MSS., not from an independent archetype. Prof. W. Ridgeway explains the connexion between Bassareus (the name for Dionysus as worshipped in Lydia) and bassara (Lydian for "fox"), by supposing that Bassareus was the special deity that kept the grapes safe from foxes, adducing a well-known passage in Theocritus and a verse from the Song of Solomon. Mr. F. B. Jevons attempts to explain the very diverse statements that have been made about the mode of orientation of Indo-European peoples—whether they turned to the north or east—by suggesting that the primitive idea was not that of direction but of movement: namely, round a person sun-wise, as opposed to "widerahins." Mr. C. M. Mulvaux studies some forms of the Homeric subjunctive. Mr. F. Haverfield contributes a brief summary of discoveries of Roman remains in Britain since May, 1894, dealing chiefly with Hadrian's Wall. We do not remember to have heard before of the hoards of no less than 17,226 "third brass" coins dug up near the Forest of Dean. Among the reviews we can only draw attention to the following of foreign books: Lutoslawski on the genuineness and order of the Platonic Dialogues, by Prof. Lewis Campbell; Wilamowitz-Möllendorf's edition of the "Heraclæ" of Euripides, by Dr. A. W. Verrall; Covino's Manilius, by Prof. Robinson Ellis; Waltzing on Roman Collegia Artificum, by Mr. A. H. J. Greenidge; Tycho Mommsen on Greek prepositions, by J. Donovan; and Gevaert on ancient music and plain-song, by H. Stuart Jones, who takes the opportunity to re-state his opposition to Mr. Monro's theory of the Greek "modes."

THE current number of Bursian's Jahresbericht contains a second instalment of a complete survey of the literature of Aristotle's "Constitution of Athens" from 1892 to 1895, by Prof. von Schoeffer, of Moscow. It includes a critical summary of Sir George Cox's articles in the ACADEMY on "Aristotle as an Historian," [and a very favourable review of Dr. Sandys' edition.]

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOLOGICAL.—(Annual Meeting, Thursday, January 23.)

PROF. POSTGATE, president, in the chair.—A vote of congratulation to Prof. Cowell (one of the founders of the society and its first president) on his birthday and the presentation of his portrait by his pupils was proposed by the president, seconded by the Master of Christ's, and passed unanimously.—Prof. Skeat read a paper, entitled "Why the e in 'Cambridge' is pronounced like the e in 'came,' with a Note on the Derivation of 'Cam' from the Name of the Town." Whether the Roman station of Camboritum was really at Cambridge, I do not know; but it is certain that the supposed similarity in the names is an illusion. The form Camboritum is of the fourth century, while Cambridge is not earlier than 1400. There is a gap between them of a thousand years; the Cam- in the one is unconnected with the Cam- in the other, and the b, r, i, in -boritum cannot be connected with "bridge." If the original name of the river had been "Cām" the d would have remained short before br; but this is not the case. The name of the town was "Grantanbrygge" in 875 A.D.; the name of Grantchester is much older, as it was called Caer-grant by Nennius (seventh century), and Granta-caestir by Bede in the eighth century. In 1010 A.D. we first hear of the county, which was called Granta-brycg-sctir—that is, "Granta-bridge-shire." Domesday Book has "Grentebrygge" for the town, and "Grentebryggeshire" for the county. About 1142, we first meet with the violent change to "Cauntebriggescir," a form which lasted, with slight changes, down to the fifteenth century. "Graunbrygge" (also spelt "Caunbrygge" in the name of the same person) survived as a surname till 1401. After 1142 the form "Cauntebrigg" is common; it occurs in Chaucer as a word of four syllables, and was Latinised as Cauntabrigia in the thirteenth century. The violent initial change from Gr- to C- was due to the Normans, who sadly maltreated many English place-names. The Anglo-French nasal ea was pronounced as aan, with the a in "baa"; and was often varied to uen. Hence we often find "Graunbrygge" and "Caunbrygge." Then the former e dropped out; and we come to such forms as "Cantbrygge" and "Caunbrygge" (fourteenth century); then "Canbrygge" (1436), and "Cawnbrygge" (1461) with n. Then the b turned the n into m, giving "Cāmbrigg" (after 1400) and "Caunbrygge" (1458). The long a, formerly ea in "baa," but now a in "vein," was never shortened. Cf. F. dame with E. "dame"; O.F. chaambre, chambre with E. "chamber," &c. In 1372, the river was, for a short time, called the "Cant." The revival of learning gave rise to the Latinised river-name Cāmus or Chamus (1571), found even in Milton. The "Cam" at last appears in Speed's map (1610), and in Drayton (1613). The short a is etymologically wrong. Meanwhile the river-name "Grant" or "Granta" endured through all the centuries to the present day. Briefly, "Cāmbrigg" is the modernised form of "Grantan-brygge," which suffered some violent changes in Anglo-French. "Cam" suggested by the written form "Cam-bridge" is a product of the sixteenth century, having no connexion with the Welsh cam, or the British cambro, "crooked."

VIKING CLUB.—(Friday, January 31.)

W. F. KIRBY, Esq., in the chair.—Dr. Jon Stefansson read a paper on "The Saga." The lecturer said that when we speak of Sagas, we mean, par excellence, the Icelandic family Sagas. The fact that only Iceland and not Norway should have these, can only be explained on the supposition that the inhabitants of Iceland were differentiated from their kinsmen in Norway, not only by their new surroundings, but also by a strong infusion of the artistic spirit of the Celt. More than one half of the settlers of Iceland were born and bred in the half-Norse and half-Celtic petty kingdoms in Ireland and the Western Isles. Story-telling had, after centuries, reached a high perfection in Ireland. The mode and manner of telling stories, the elaborate memorising of hundreds of them by heart, all agree with the Icelandic way. Yet the difference of the Irish and Icelandic Saga stands out in strong relief. In Iceland its power is concentrated on human emotion. In Ireland it deals more with the supernatural and gorgeous, though it has a feeling for nature which the Icelandic Saga lacks. Fate does not work itself out more inexorably and artistically in tragedies of Sophocles than it does in some of the Sagas. Take, for example, Laxdæla Saga. The final catastrophe is at first but faintly and vaguely indicated. Chapter by chapter, insensibly, it grows more clearly inevitable. The conflict is prepared with the most consummate art. No details, however small, are neglected that may contribute to bring about the end aimed at. The thread of fate which binds together all the moving incidents of the tale is woven into it with a master hand. The elements themselves are leagued with fate. Geirmund does not get a fair wind on leaving Iceland, until the sword that was destined to give Kiartan his death-wound had been taken from him. If character-drawing of men and women is the highest achievement in literature, the Icelandic Sagas rank with the highest literature of the world. Even their very excrescences are not so superfluous as is thought. Family registers are, in the light of heredity, useful helps to elucidate the characters of hero and heroine. The relation of the Sagas of Ireland and Iceland has not yet been studied by one who was equally equipped with knowledge of the vast body of Sagas existing in the two countries—in the case of Ireland, mostly yet unpublished.—Mr. R. Ford Smith said that he had been very much interested by Dr. Stefansson's paper, but there were one or two points he should like to comment on. With regard to the theory that the Sagas, or perhaps rather the power of composing Sagas, was principally derived from the intercourse of the Norsemen with Celtic races, it was surely the fact that the Sagas were written from Icelandic originals. Many Sagas—for instance, those contained in the Heimskringla and the historical Sagas generally—must probably have been brought from Norway by fugitives from Harald Haarfager, and Sagas so brought may surely be regarded as needing no alien inspiration. Their form was most likely derived from the shape given them by the actual tellers; for, as Dr. Stefansson had pointed out, the Sagas were handed down orally, and the fact of the whole people being more or less Saga-tellers is a strong argument for their preserving the actual truth of events, as everyone could check the teller if he erred. We were very fortunate in having them, as for this reason they had probably reached us in a very perfect state. But he had always been under the impression that when the chief of a district rode down to the shore on the arrival of a ship, it was to fix the price of the goods in the cargo, rather than to learn the latest news. He would also like to protest against the description of Njal as meekly giving in to his wife and compounding for her quarrels. He had always looked on it as a very noble characteristic of Njal, that he declined to be dragged into a quarrel with his friend by female spite, counting his friendship worth the lives of many thralls.—Mr. A. F. Major, hon. sec., said that he would endeavour to deal with some of the points raised by the last speaker, leaving it to the lecturer to correct him if he were wrong. It was, he thought, a fact that the chief of a district rode down when a ship reached the shores of Iceland to fix the price of the goods, and to purchase what he himself required. Till he had done so no one might traffic with the merchantmen without incurring the risk of an onslaught from the chief's followers. He agreed also with the last speaker's remarks about Njal, and considered his refusal to be dragged into the quarrels of his wife a very fine trait. Njal valued his ancient friendship with Gunnar above the lives of many thralls, as Mr. Smith had said. With regard to the larger question of the origin of the Sagas, he thought northern scholars erred in insisting on the Icelandic literature as something quite unique in the North. The remarkable feature with regard to that literature was rather the fact that it had been recorded and handed down to us. But there was evidence that a considerable store of Sagas and songs very similar had also existed elsewhere in the North. In Denmark there were the Sagas on which Saxo Grammaticus founded his work; in Norway the histories which the emigrants carried to Iceland to be handed down and committed to writing there; in England the song of Beowulf, the lays of Caedmon and Cynewulf, the songs enshrined in the Chronicle, and the lays of the people of which King Alfred speaks. There had been found, too, in Denmark a single leaf of a lost English poem, King Waldhere's lay. It evidently belonged to a work of great length, and it is probable that many other such poems had also perished, leaving no trace. He thought, too, that Dr. Karl Blind, had been present, would have had something to say of traces of Sagas among the Germanic races, still preserved in the Nibelungen Lied, or in that later, though ancient, poem of Gudrun, which must be founded on a lost Saga. It may be observed, too, that some of the Eddaic poems of the Nibelung cycle seem more akin to the German version than to the Icelandic one preserved in the Volsunga Saga, as Sigurd's death appears to take place in the free forest, as in German, and not as in Iceland by night in his hall. He knew but little of the Irish Sagas, but they seemed in spirit to differ widely from the Icelandic, though not perhaps more widely than the two lands; for the literature born among the loughs and wooded mountains, the green meadows and broad streams of Ireland would of necessity be far apart from that of the rugged rocks and gloomy valleys of Iceland, with its furious torrents brawling through vast lava wastes and only a few scant acres here and there of fertile soil. Perhaps the most striking feature of the Icelandic Sagas, that they are practically the earliest prose writings of modern Europe, may be due to Irish influence, for most of the literature he had mentioned is in verse. But it could not be imagined that the kinsmen of those who sang the songs of Beowulf and Waldhere, or handed down the Sagas on which Saxo drew, needed a blend of Celtic blood to give them inspiration. They, too, had drunk of the mead that Odin stole from the giants: the mead that the goddess Saga poured out for the Skalds in Valhalla, and had listened to Bragi, the teller of the endless tale. Rightly considered, the marvel of Icelandic literature is that it has lived when so much has perished and left us scarce a vestige that it once was. All honour to the people whose sturdy love of freedom won them a home where they could keep the songs and records of their race alive, and the debt we owe them for what they have saved for us is very great. But other lands were less happy. When the Danes ravished England tirelessly for two hundred years or more, giving to the flames hall and garth and abbey with their stores of precious vellums, who knows what priceless treasures of song and story went flaring up to the blue lift above. Surely the Eddas and Sagas were but the peaks of a vast continent that elsewhere the sea of constant strife had swept away.—Mrs. Clara Jerrold thought the views of the last speaker were rather wide of the mark, as it could not be said that scholars were agreed in regarding Iceland as the only land where myth and mystery were preserved. The ancient history of England, and all the lands about, were full of myths and stories. Yet it was true that the Icelanders were the only people who made a real literature out of their ancient Sagas, and they have probably preserved for us almost all their store. Was it not likely that these stories had a common source? The English tale of Beowulf, the Danish Grendel story, even the Eddaic myth of the ironwood, and the wolves and witches that inhabited it, seemed to spring from one stock. Perhaps Norway, or rather Norway and Sweden, for in this connexion they were indivisible, was the place of their birth, whence they spread to surrounding lands, though to the Icelanders belong the chief credit for their preservation.—Dr. Stefansson replied, as to the Icelanders bringing all their Sagas from Norway, it must be remembered that the history of Norway itself was written in Iceland. When he spoke, too, of the temple-chief coming down to the shore for news, he, of course, did not mean that he came down for that alone, but for that among other things, and to invite the chief man to stay with him when doubtless news would be interchanged. It is true that Saxo incorporated many stories in his work; but, as he had pointed out, Saxo himself says that it was from Icelanders he learned them, or most of them. So he, a Dane, goes to Icelanders, staying at the Court of Denmark to get the materials for Danish history, showing that if other northern countries had their Sagas, Icelanders alone could record them or relate them artistically. Of course, there were Sagas in other countries; but they have not come down to us, and seem to have been principally in verse, to which he did not refer. It may perhaps be fair to infer from a scrap that has reached us the existence of a vast body of early English epics, or Sagas; still it can only be an assumption. The old English literature that we have is very inferior to the Sagas. Mr. William Morris is right when he says that Iceland should be to the North of Europe what Greece is to the South.—The chairman said that it seemed to him that the peculiar merit of the Icelandic literature was that it was largely in prose, unlike most other old literatures that we possess. Scandinavia likewise seems to have had a character of its own, which has largely impressed the older literature of other nations. The ballad literature of Finland and Esthonia contains large traces of Scandinavian influence, while the folk-tales were to a large extent of more modern origin, apparently derived in the former country from Russia, and in the latter from Germany. Scandinavia had likewise left a strong impress on Lappish popular literature. But in dealing with any popular literature we must allow for diffusion, both in ancient and modern times, to an extent which we can hardly realise. Popular story-tellers still exist in Ireland; but even those who cannot read or write often take their subjects from the Arabian Nights and other printed sources. The aphorisms in the Havamal are so remarkably like those in the Oriental story of the Wise Heycar, that it is difficult to imagine that the Vikings did not bring back Oriental matter from the East before the time of the Crusades, when it is generally supposed that the influence of Oriental on Western thought and literature really began.

FINE ART.

THE EXCAVATION OF CORINTH.

We quote the following from the New York Nation :—

"Since completing the excavations at the Argive Heraion and at Eretria, the American School at Athens remains without a field for explorations. The Germans are occupied with their work on the supposed site of the ancient agora of Athens; the French are still busy at Delphi; and the English are likely to begin excavations the coming spring on the island of Melos. As yet the explorations of the Americans have not identified themselves with any of the chief centres of ancient Greek life. The work at Assos, Thorikos, Anthedon, Sikyon, Ikaría, Eretria was all of it admirably successful, and yielded results which are of permanent value. The excavations at the Argive Heraion were the most extensive and the most complete of any, and very rich in results; but they involved the exploration of a single cult-site, isolated from the city which names it by a distance of several miles. Though this comes nearest to being a site of first importance of all which the Americans have undertaken to explore, it cannot, of course, rank with the Olympia of the Germans nor the Delphi of the French.

"In looking about for a place for further work, Dr. Richardson has been attracted to Corinth. Though the second city in general importance in ancient Greece, practically nothing has as yet been done toward its exploration. The Germans some years ago dug about the foundations of the ancient Doric temple, of which several columns are still standing, sufficiently to determine its ground plan. Nothing whatsoever has been done, however, to fix the topography of the ancient city, nor to locate with certainty even one of the many temples and monuments which Pausanias saw in the agora and its neighbourhood. There is not so much as a well-established theory as to even the approximate location of the agora. The theatre, usually the easiest thing to identify among the ruins of an ancient city, has not yet been found, though Pausanias speaks of it twice, and locates it definitely between two temples standing outside, and in general to the west or south-west of, the agora. The ancient Doric temple mentioned above is frequently called a temple of Athena, but utterly without authority or competent reason. The entire site of this great city, whose walls, according to Strabo, involved a circuit of forty stadia, remains a totally unexplored field. And yet there are abundant evidences that excavation would be rewarded by immediate results. The ancient fountains of which Pausanias makes emphatic mention, and which he treats as landmarks, are still to be seen, together with the colossal aqueducts hewn out of the solid rock which conveyed their water supply. At one place on the vast terrace which probably formed the site for the central part of the city, there can be seen the outlines of the foundations of some great edifice, making still a hillock in the midst of a wheat-field; close beside, there protrudes from the earth, as if tempting investigation, a colossal column-drum.

"Most of the territory which would invite the first exploration is free from dwellings. The ancient agora lies perhaps partly under a group of shabby huts, grouped about an ancient fountain that may well represent the fountain which Pausanias speaks of as being in the agora. The only difficulty which could attend an attempt at excavation would be found in the fact that the land is private property; but, undoubtedly, permission to dig at different points in the fields can be readily obtained, sufficiently to make a beginning of the work and to secure the first orientations in the topography. The Greek Government and the local authorities have shown themselves friendly to the undertaking, and seem ready to help in every way.

"The only question seems to be the one of ways and means. The school has but 500 dols. available for excavations this year. If it undertakes Corinth, it ought to have 2,000 dols. a year for five years. The German and French Schools depend for such funds upon their respective Governments. We have a better and, I believe, a safer reliance in the generosity and public spirit of our citizens. It is a great opportunity, and worthy to be ranked as a national cause.

"BENJ. IDE WHEELER,
"The American School,
"Athens, Greece, January 8, 1896."

[In a subsequent number of the Nation, it is stated that the Greek Government has granted formal authority to the American School to conduct excavations at Corinth, and that work will be begun next month (March).]

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

It is generally understood that, at the meeting of Royal Academicians to be held on Thursday night—after we have gone to press—Sir J. E. Millais will be unanimously elected president; and that he has consented to hold the office, which is in theory an annual one, at least to the end of the current year.

MESSRS. BOUSSOD, VALADON & Co. will open next week, at the Goupil Gallery, an exhibition of twenty masterpieces of the Barbizon school of painters.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS announce a new work by Mr. Frank Preston Stearns, author of "The Life and Genius of Tintoretto." It will be entitled The Midsummer of Italian Art; and it consists of an examination of the works of Fra Angelico, Michel Angelo, Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael, and Correggio, illustrated with five heliotype plates.

DR. MAX OHNEFALSCH-RIECHTER will deliver a course of four lectures, entitled "My Twelve Years' Stay in Cyprus," with lime-light illustrations, in the East hall of the Imperial Institute, on Tuesdays during March, at 5 p.m. He proposes to deal in a popular manner with such subjects as: Cyprus under British rule; the excavations that have been carried on by others as well as himself; Homeric and classical customs, and their modern survivals; analogies to Biblical customs.

At a meeting of the applied art section of the Society of Arts, to be held on Tuesday next, with Mr. Walter Crane in the chair, Mr. William Burton will read a paper on "The Palette of the Potter."

At a meeting of the Royal Meteorological Society, held on Wednesday, Mr. R. Inwards, ex-president, read a paper on "Turner's Representations of Lightning," which he considered to be true to nature, and demonstrated the same by placing an actual example of Turner's work side by side with a photograph of a real flash of lightning.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Salomon Reinach exhibited a water-colour drawing and photographs of a fine vase, with red figures picked out in gold, which was found in 1894 on the Acropolis of Rhodes, and is now in the Constantinople Museum. He maintained that it is one of the few examples of Greek ceramic art that can be dated with some precision; and he argued that it was painted at Athens circa 410 B.C. The subject is a novel one: the birth of Plutus, the god of wealth, who is being presented to Demeter, his mother, by a personification of Earth, before an assemblage of the gods, including Triptolemus. According to a very ancient tradition, Plutus was a son of Demeter, by the Cretan Iasion.

THE STAGE.

"A WOMAN'S REASON."

JUST as, according as was said last week, "The Sign of the Cross" is, in its own way, in dealing with unusual themes, something quite exceptional in power and interest, so, at the Shaftesbury, in dealing with the customary complications of modern life and artificial society "A Woman's Reason" is remarkable entirely. Indeed, these pieces are the two legitimate successes of the winter season, and to anybody seriously interested in the theatre the one as much as the other deserves to be discussed. "A Woman's Reason" is the joint work of Mr. F. C. Phillips, a novelist of character and style, and Mr. C. H. Brookfield, a wit by inheritance, and an actor plentifully supplied with stage experience. The combination is a happy one; and the result is that, while in "A Woman's Reason" we get a play constructed with the full appreciation of theatrical necessities which often it is only the actor or the long-trained playwright who can supply, we get also a work much nearer literature than that which we are wont to receive from the contemporary dramatist. It is but very rarely that the contemporary dramatist is really literary; or, to be truer to the fact, he is literary only by fits and starts: he gives you a good scene that suits the purpose of the stage—and it may even chance to be a natural one—but wait awhile and he will display, probably, his meretricious method, his superficial vision, by some completest breakdown, some profound inconsistency in a character which till now we thought that he had understood. Take the work to pieces; ask, "Is that probable?" "Or this?" No, it is impossible, of course. It is but jerry-built cheap writing. As for the spirit of it, it was "made in Germany." It suits the momentary demands of a generation that has lost touch, to a great extent, with the sterling, the original, the subtle and true.

With all that order of production, then, of which we have so much—and put forward generally with so much of pretension—"A Woman's Reason" is in remarkable contrast. The characters act intelligibly; and not only is the language telling, but it is appropriate. The wit talks wit; the parish priest, with leanings towards worldliness, is amusing unconsciously. But the piece at the present moment is not new, and after what the daily newspapers have done for us it does not need to be described. As to its story, let us only say here that it is admirably knit, convincingly conducted, and that it preaches to us, alike from the end and the beginning, a lesson that is of charity and not of cynicism.

It is with the interpretation, which is so remarkable, which adds so much to the force of the skilled fable, that we are chiefly concerned. With perhaps a single exception—and that one that has recently arisen through no fault of the Shaftesbury management, but through the stress, as we imagine, of a previous engagement—the cast is as strong as it could be made by a wise choice and, as we take it, a not ungenerous outlay. The exception lies in the fact that a very agreeable and sufficiently competent young lady has been promoted to a part in which Miss Maud Millett—now departed from the theatre—must have shone brightly. To the unconventional and thoroughly bright part of the parson's daughter, what incisiveness and style must Miss Millett have imparted! We were too late to see her, however, and her successor played well, but not supremely well. But as to all the other chief parts—the chief of all especially—would it be possible to better them? Thoroughly wise—and a little penetrating besides—was the management when it offered the chief heroine to Mrs. Beerbohm Tree. Mrs. Tree's stage career—not yet a very long one—has been marked by vicissitudes. It was her bad fortune, more than once in her quite early days, to be entrusted with parts altogether too exacting for her. Discerning—as we did, of course—her extreme intelligence, we doubted, and could not help doubting, her emotional power. And now there are parts too full of passionate and of very simple emotion to be quite justly grappled with—as I surmise—by this most interesting mistress of a subtle and observant art. But Nina Keith, that daughter of Lord Bletchley who becomes Mrs. D'Acosta, is not one of them. Of the breeding of the girl, of her whimsicality and charm, of her waywardness and grace, and of her woman's heart at the bottom of all, Mrs. Tree is the delightful exponent. She is to be watched at every turn, in a part full of variety, charged with coquetry and genuine feeling, with irritation, with a silly but not unnatural jealousy, with bitterness, with sadness; there is not a movement, not an expression, we can afford to miss. As Nina's sister-in-law, Miss Florence West—on whose high qualities we have more than once laid stress—is scarcely less satisfactory. The part is a simpler one. It has only womanliness in it: only tenderness, one might say, almost. But it is performed—nay, rather it is lived in—quite charmingly. In a piece wherein not one part is played really badly, it is the three chief men who next deserve attention. Mr. Lewis Waller is intensely and quietly sympathetic as the husband of Nina—sympathetic by reason of an almost inexplicable directness—the complete exponent of as competent and straight a character as it is possible to find. Mr. Brookfield as Lord Bletchley—dyed carefully, “the padded man that wears the stays,” as Mr. Thackeray said of an illustrious contemporary—gets the largest of true “character parts,” and plays it without any exaggeration, with true humour, and with singular effectiveness. Mr. Kemble is the last man who needs to be particularly mentioned—he says sly things with a voice rich and rolling as with Port of '34. His is an admirable study. Of the fashionable clergyman of a particular type Mr. Kemble has caught perfectly the polish and the unctuousness; and the way in which he piously and half philosophically suggests to some very smart people that in life “even the golden cross is a heavy one” is worthy of the actor who made quite unforgettable a character, so ingeniously conceived by Mr. Henry Arthur Jones—the character of that distinguished pessimist, Mr. Burge Jawl, whose “vital processes,” as he was wont to assure us, as he sank back to his repose, were “so exceedingly slow”—which thing, considering both his appetite and his philosophic indolence, was scarcely matter for surprise.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

AT Mr. Dolmetsch's concert of ancient music, on Tuesday afternoon, three pieces of special interest were performed. The first was a Suite for harpsichord by Purcell, noticeable for its grace, charm, and quaintness. It was not in music of this kind that the composer revealed his highest powers; there are, however, traces of genius to be found even in his trifles. The second was No. 1 of a set of six Sonatas, entitled “Musical Representation of some Bible Stories,” by Johann Kuhnau, the immediate predecessor of J. S. Bach at St. Thomas's, Leipzig. The music of this Sonata Mr. Dolmetsch, in a few introductory remarks, described as “most wonderful and interesting; like Bach, and yet possessing an individuality of its own.” All this is true enough; but in connexion with programme music, which is so much talked about at the present day, there is more to say about these Sonatas. A more favourable opportunity will, however, be afforded when the complete set is reprinted; at present only two have appeared. Though not actually the first, they are, without question, the most remarkable of early attempts at programme music. In illustrating the Bible stories by means of tones, Kuhnau has at times recourse to what may be termed descriptive music of the lower kind: the stamping of Goliath, the pebble cast from the sling, and the fall of the giant, are expressed in realistic fashion; but the higher province of music, the depicting of feelings and emotions, is by no means neglected. In the “David and Goliath” the objective element is, naturally, specially prominent; but in “Saul” (No. 2, which Mr. Dolmetsch announces for his next concert), and again in “The Burial of Jacob” (No. 6), the subjective asserts its full power. Kuhnau well understood the limitations of his art; and his musical gift, as was afterwards the case with Handel, always preserved his most realistic ventures from the charge of being ridiculous. A recent writer has observed that Kuhnau's first and second Sonatas “deserve attention, if only on the ground of their being the direct ancestors of the ‘Battle of Prague.’” The peculiarities of any work of art are most likely first to attract attention; and so long as the battle-picture in No. 1, or the casting of the javelin by Saul and his paroxysms in No. 2 (in their way extremely clever) are made unduly prominent, the true greatness of the music, the true aims of the composer, and the boldness of the form, or rather the boldness shown by the determining of the form by the subject, cannot be perceived in the proper light. Kuhnau's Sonatas are rather the “direct ancestors” of Beethoven's “Pastoral Symphony”; the “Battle of Prague” blots the name of programme music with “hateful bastardy.” The “David and Goliath” was expressively rendered on the harpsichord by Mrs. E. Dolmetsch. Her clever daughter, Miss Hélène, then played on the clavichord Prelude and Fugue No. 7, from the second book of Bach's “Well-Tempered Clavier.” The composer was specially fond of that instrument, and for certain delicate effects it was superior to the harpsichord. To hear Bach's music on the clavichord is intensely interesting; and the opportunities which Mr. Dolmetsch, Mr. Hipkins, and other musicians give us of hearing ancient music performed on the instruments for which they were written, are most welcome. But the music of Bach, and, indeed, much of Kuhnau's, is too great for the instruments of their day, of feeble and evanescent tone. If their music be rendered on the modern pianoforte, there may be loss of a few special features peculiar to those instruments; yet, on the whole, there is, to our thinking, gain. Anyhow, a clavichord in one of our large halls is an impossibility; all, except a favoured few in the front rows, would have to rely largely for their enjoyment upon the pleasures of imagination.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

MR. HENSCHEL gave a special Wagner concert on the thirteenth anniversary of Wagner's death; and the programme illustrated the wonderful career of the master, which practically commenced with “Rienzi,” and concluded nobly with “Parsifal.” Excerpts from the operas and music-dramas of Wagner may lose by being given in the concert-room, and yet such a programme as that of Mr. Henschel's has its uses. To say nothing of the rising generation, there are probably still many whose opportunities of hearing the complete works are limited. Mr. Henschel conducted with sympathy and ability.

DR. JOACHIM made his first appearance this season at the Monday Popular Concert. His welcome was enthusiastic. He led the Beethoven Quartet in E minor (Op. 59, No. 2), and was ably supported by MM. Rice, Gibson, and Piatti. For solo he played the Adagio from Spohr's 11th Violin Concerto, and for an encore a movement by Bach. His playing still shows the same skill and earnestness, though the fire of former years has, as is natural, somewhat abated. Miss Fanny Davies gave three pieces by Brahms with skill and earnestness, though scarcely with sufficient power.

WE may congratulate Mr. F. H. Cowen on his appointment as conductor of the Manchester Concerts, and also of those of the Philharmonic Society at Liverpool. As successor to the late Sir C. Hallé he will be judged by a high standard; but he has skill, experience, and enthusiasm in his favour.

THE number of orchestral concerts in London is ever on the increase. Mr. R. Newman announces three under the conductorship of M. Lamoureux, who will bring his orchestra with him from Paris, where he enjoys great and well-deserved fame. The dates of these concerts, at the Queen's Hall, will be April 13, 16, and 18.

in OTHER TONGUES: being a Critical Account of the Translations of the Principal Poems of Robert Burns which have appeared in Foreign Languages, together with the Foreign Texts. With numerous Portraits. By WILLIAM JACKS. Extra post 8vo, 9s. net.

[This day.]

"I was led into the present task by seeing now and again in newspapers reviews of foreign translations of the works of Robert Burns, and by occasionally meeting with specimens of these translations in my wanderings on the Continent. From remarks in these reviews, the great bulk of the translations seemed to be unknown or unregarded in this country, and I thought it might be useful to students of languages, and gratifying to admirers of the poet, were the various translations, so far as they are known, dealt with in one volume."—From the AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

"It will be hard for Burns' enthusiasts to produce during this centenary year of the poet's death a more interesting memorial than Mr. Jack's 'Robert Burns in Other Tongues.' Not only has Mr. Jack's collected translations from sixteen languages—about a score if patois are reckoned in—but he gives us excellent critical studies, comparing translation with translation, and pointing out especially happy renderings, and also those renderings where the translators have misunderstood the original or have paraphrased it out of recognition. Portraits of the translators and a highly characteristic frontispiece of Burns add to the charm of a book that is not merely a curiosity of literature but of intrinsic literary interest."—Literary World.

LITERATURE.

Life of Cardinal Manning, Archbishop of Westminster. By Edmund Sheridan Parcell. In 2 vols. (Macmillans.)

(Second Notice.)

THE body which Manning entered was slowly struggling out of a pitiful state. The English missions, as Wiseman found them, did not provide for anything like all the Roman Catholics in England; but they were nearly all in debt, and so deprecated new enterprises which might encroach upon their scanty funds. Mr. Purcell prints a tragical letter from Wiseman to Faber, from which it appears that all the religious orders domiciled in England got dispensations from their rule in all directions, while clinging to it so far as it dispensed from taking sole charge of a mission district. Nor was this the worst; it used to be said, "See how these Christians love one another." The strongest impression Mr. Purcell's second volume will make upon outsiders is, "See how these priests suspect each other." It is not an impression which the memoirs of either Ward or Faber make. Ward lived for dogma and orthodox metaphysics, and Faber for devotion. Each found the life of his hand. Manning was slowly drawn within the pale by the overmastering vision of the one Body sanctified by the one Spirit. Concrete experiences did not disturb his ideal. So far back as 1842 he had written, in a sermon on "The Probation of the Church," "We are apt to speak of the Church as if the original scheme of the Divine Mind were to realise at this present time something very different from what we see now." If the Anglican Church of the nineteenth century had had as clear and coherent a theory of itself as the Roman Church of the fifteenth, his faith would have survived practical shortcomings. He fished for souls and other things patiently, skilfully, upon the whole contentedly, in very muddy waters. He brought up a mitre and a cardinal's hat for himself; he brought up little for his friends though he fished for them too. For some three years after his conversion he divided his time between theological study at Rome (with sermons during the tourist season) and flying visits to England. For some three years more he preached and had a confessional at the Jesuits' church in Farm-street, till the Fathers found that literally and otherwise he was taking up too much room. Then he founded the Oblates of St. Charles at Bayswater, and took over a half-built church and fitted it up for worship. This gave him a position, though the order has never flourished on the scale of the Brompton Oratory.

What was more important, Manning now got hold of Wiseman, who was by this time deep in hot water, and never got out. So far as can be gathered from Mr. Purcell's candid narrative, the situation was as follows. Everybody from Wiseman downwards was more or less excited by the idea that diocesan bishops must be independent compared with apostolic vicars. Wiseman, as Cardinal Archbishop, was more or less disposed to fancy himself invested with the plenitude of Papal power in England. There were all sorts of questions how the funds and institutions of the old vicariates were to be divided between the new sees. He was at loggerheads with his Chapter, though he was fond of Canon Searle—a rough and genial personage, who was suspected at Rome of bullying the other bishops, and by Manning of bullying Wiseman too. Wiseman was a bad man of business, though in many ways a good figurehead and something more. He thought he would like a coadjutor (with the right of succession); the coadjutor got on better than he did with the other bishops, and was in other ways too much for him. Manning, whom Pius IX. proprio motu appointed Provost of Westminster in 1857, complicated matters by getting Wiseman to put the seminary of the old London vicariate into the hands of the Oblates, without consulting Grant, the saintly Bishop of Southwark. Manning's theory of the whole business was, that opposition to Wiseman was opposition to the Pope, and that Errington, Wiseman's coadjutor, was at the head of a Gallican conspiracy to which the other bishops were parties more or less. If this convenient theory—which, no doubt, was held in good faith—had been well founded, the Propaganda would have decided for Wiseman and Manning all along the line: it decided almost everything against them. Wiseman had to divide the funds, to remove the Oblates (though when they were away the seminarists actually smoked and drank and barred out their superiors); he had to renounce all interference with Ushaw, the northern seminary. But Manning had one success: the Propaganda relieved Errington of his duties as coadjutor in 1860; in 1862 Pius IX. commanded him to renounce his canonical rights of succession. Manning then set himself to shut out the risk of a Gallican successor by getting a new coadjutor named, who was to have no duties, but a right of succession, and had arranged, subject to Wiseman's consent, for the appointment of Ullathorne. But, broken as he was, Wiseman had energy enough left to protest effectually against being saddled with an heir-apparent. It was a shabby business; but it left Pius IX. under the belief that Manning was the one trustworthy English prelate. Luckily for him, when Wiseman died the Chapter of Westminster had spirit enough to send up Errington's name with those of Clifford and Grant; and the Propaganda considered this an insult to the Pope, who was thereby emboldened to take the appointment into his own hands. Manning worked so far as he could for the appointment of Talbot, a convert of 1845, the favourite chamberlain of the Pope, and a close confederate, though hardly a friend, of his own. The Pope appointed Manning, who was always at his best after a success, and made friends with everybody except Newman. There was one drawback. Pius insisted on his coming to Rome to receive his Pallium in September, in the heart of the dead season; as he was appointed in May and consecrated in June, there was a touch of malice in this. Manning and Talbot quite agreed about the miseria umana visible in Pius IX., but Manning always hoped that he was a saint quand même.

The story of Manning's relations with Newman is fully told, and is not pleasant reading for the admirers of either. From 1829 Manning had a dining acquaintance with Newman, which gradually improved up to 1841. In 1845 Manning assured Newman, on his secession, of his unaltered love, and shortly after assured Gladstone that "want of truth" was the common character of all 'verts. When he came back to England he found, or fancied, Newman tainted with Gallicanism. Wiseman himself had fallen a little under suspicion, and when he was directing Newman's theological reading he sent him to wrong authors. A paper of Newman's had been "delated" by a bishop to Rome, and though never censured was always remembered against him. The group of writers headed by Lord Acton would have liked Newman to lead them where they wished to go. Manning assumed that Newman was their leader, though he might have easily known that Newman only took the Rambler at the request of Wiseman, to keep the writers in order, which he soon found a task too hard. Manning had a perfect right to disapprove of the Rambler and its successors; perhaps to disapprove of Newman, who, instead of taking his inspiration from the reigning Pope, set himself to interpret and assimilate a long historical tradition which left questions open and did not exclude compromises. Newman's own theory of open questions was that Roman Catholics should keep silence on both sides; Manning's was that his own side might speak out, and the other must not reply. Manning had got the Propaganda to sanction his theory that Roman Catholics ought to avoid Oxford and Cambridge: a view which his successor, the closest of his friends after Robert Wilberforce, promptly dropped, with the full approval of Rome. Some of the bishops, including Ullathorne, did not share this view, and would have been glad if it could have been defeated, as it would have been if Newman had founded an Oxford oratory. He bought land and half disavowed his intention of founding an oratory, just as he went to Littlemore and disavowed the intention of founding a monastery. He justly observed to Oakeley that Manning was personally responsible for the decree about the Universities, but not necessarily for its effect upon the scheme of an Oxford oratory. When Manning, who was conciliating everybody, went out of his way to conciliate him, he declined to meet him until he had received a practical proof of goodwill, and suggested that Manning should get the decision about the Oxford oratory rescinded at Rome. Manning, when convinced that his complaints about the Rambler were unfounded so far as Newman was concerned, would not apologise. When Newman promised to say seven masses for him he promised to say twelve for Newman, who shortly after closed the correspondence by a statement that when communicating with Manning "he did not know whether he stood on his head or his heels." Manning was certainly less than just to Newman. He noted at the time "that Oakeley and another member of the Westminster Chapter were perfectly silly" over the Apologia; but, though he thought Newman was in a bad set and took a bad line, and kept the notion alive at Rome, he actually did far less against him than against others, including Grant. He may have had grounds for his opinion that, if the second half of Newman's life was less successful and fruitful than the first, some of the reasons lay in himself. He drew away from Wiseman as well as from Manning, from Faber as well as from Ward. Wiseman set him at Birmingham, and when he called him to London he refused to follow. He threatened to withdraw from the Academia which Manning had founded, if Wiseman, the president, did anything to commit it to the Temporal Power. There was probably a grain of truth in the legend of Achilles in his tent, but the greatest grievance was nobody's fault. Newman had lost his old public, and could not find another. At last, as they could not give him back St. Mary's, they gave him a cardinal's hat. Here Manning played a curious part. He wrote a very prompt and gracious letter in support of the request of the Duke of Norfolk and the Marquis of Ripon; he sent it by a Roman prelate, who arrived long after the English nobles had had their audience and run the risk of compromising themselves and Newman by the appearance of putting lay pressure on the Pope. When the offer arrived, and Newman shyly and respectfully hinted that he was too old to leave the Oratory, Manning, who had seen his letter, set a statement afloat that he had declined the hat. When Newman's long old age, which Manning interpreted as a Divine favour, ended, he spoke at the Oratory with unfeigned emotion of his brother and friend of more than sixty years. Probably there had never been a time when Manning had regarded Newman without some measure of admiration, and even some measure of special goodwill. He was liable to fits of hot temper, his family liked to talk of his Berserkir rages; but he was generally calm, always placable and forgetful* as well as forgiving. Without being false or shallow, his affections were singularly tractable, they could thrive without food or exercise; he could take them out at proper times to look at, and be sure of finding them warm and bright, and shut them up again without visible pain if he felt called to press a principle at the cost of a friend. He was a loving brother, and used to write to his brothers and sisters on the blessings of family affection; but upon his conversion he wrote offering to keep out of the way. After his conversion he met Bishop Oxenden, his old school-fellow, once, and convinced him that his affection had lasted. In his latter years he was fond of contrasting himself as a man of action with Newman as a student and recluse. He became aware by degrees of his own lack of speculative depth; he is said to have looked like a martyr on the rack at the meetings of the Metaphysical Society, where Ward enjoyed himself and shone. His own papers fell very flat: then he remembered that he was a man of action. He forgot that St. Augustin (to say nothing of St. Athanasius) was a more voluminous and a more influential author than Newman, a busier ecclesiastic than Manning: he had a shorter time for work than either, but he was a very great saint.

* When Gladstone renewed his intercourse with Manning early in the sixties, Manning told him he was doing the work of Antichrist in promoting Italian unity: he had quite forgotten this in 1874, when Vaticanism was the first cloud on their renewed friendship.

Manning's one great act was the part which he played at the Vatican Council. In any sense in which any statesman ever carries a measure, he carried the definition of the Infallibility of the Pope. It was a barren victory: all that has come of it yet is that Leo XIII. has found it easier to paralyse the Catholic vote in France. The chapter on the Council is one of the dullest in the book. Manning saw nothing behind the opposition but Döllinger and his allies. He gave Darboy credit for believing the doctrine, though his arguments against the opportuneness of the definition told against the truth of the doctrine defined; he knew something of a suggested compromise in which, apparently, Cardinal Bilio was mixed up, not exactly to his credit; but Mr. Purcell was not allowed to tell the story. On the other hand, we have a number of notes (only dated by days of the week) from Odo Russell, the only diplomatist who thought the definition either feasible or desirable, whose influence with Lord Clarendon kept the English Cabinet from protesting in advance against the definition, on the invitation of Bavaria. Later on he compromised his reputation for prudence, by declaring that the Pope ought to leave Rome when the Italians came, or that the Conclave ought to leave it when the Pope died. The Conclave was Manning's last approach to an ecclesiastical success. The College of Cardinals had defeated the first attempt of Pius to nominate him; and Pius himself was reported to have poked fun at Antonelli il secondo when Manning had lectured him on the importance of grasping the situation, which meant finding a substitute for the Temporal Power and a good excuse for giving it up.* But he was still important enough to be admitted to the caucus which met at Bartolini's to agree on the election of Pecci, and discuss possible substitutes. They passed round complimentary nominations among themselves, probably meant to be declined; and Bilio, who declined on the grounds among other things of weakness of character, thought a foreign Pope was wanted, and that Manning was the man, especially as he was so thoroughly Romanised. Manning wisely replied that an Italian was wanted who knew and loved Italy, and whom Italians knew and loved.

We learn less than we could wish of Manning's methods as a propagandist. Mme. Belloc bears out his own hints that he trusted mainly to the force of truth—or definite and impressive statement. Mr. Purcell gives some curious letters to Lady Herbert just after her conversion. In one he congratulates her on her submission to her children being brought up Protestants; in another he decides that she may read family prayers as before, but if a Protestant clergyman reads she must not join, though she may act as organist; she may also take her children to church, but only as their guardian—and in case of necessity. We hear more than enough of Monsignor Capel and the abortive University College at Kensington, and after all learn only half Manning's side of the case. In one thing he blamed Capel unfairly. If a quasi-university was to be started, it was only reasonable to engage the best professors available at decent salaries. Apparently Manning expected professors to lecture on the chance of fees if students came. He built and paid for a seminary as costly as the bankrupt college; but he failed to fill it. The fiasco, as Mr. Purcell calls it, was the outcome of one of Manning's few persistent policies: he was always in favour of the secular clergy as against the regular.* He attested and clearly shared the belief of Pius IX. that the suppression of the religious orders in Italy was a blessing in disguise. He was indignant that they should think themselves unequal to directing nuns or to deciding on "vocations." He stuck to his opinion that they ought to be called "pastoral" not "secular," in spite of a decision of Rome. As Archbishop he treated the Jesuits, who helped him so much when he came first to London, with uniform severity. He set down their society as one of the obstacles to the conversion of England in a list which he drew up about 1890. As some who might be personally wounded are alive, his reasons, which occupy five or six pages, are withheld. He was blind to the great obstacle of all. Most Englishmen who want a religion want one that will fit in with the rest of their life; they want to be consoled; they are willing to be improved: they do not really wish to be renewed or converted. On the other hand, Manning was most large-hearted in his judgment on outsiders: he liked to dwell on the number of converts who had preserved the innocence of their Anglican baptism. He told one convert who had lost her father that his justice to her at and after her conversion was a proof of saving faith and charity.

* Mr. Tollemache (Benjamin Jowett: a Personal Memoir, p. 27, note) quotes a Catholic priest who wrote to him after reading what Jowett said on the impossibility of preaching eternal punishment: "Did I ever tell you of a saying of Cardinal Manning on the hell question? A friend suggesting that it was a place of eternal torment eternally untenanted, he answered, 'If one did not hope that it was so who could endure life?'"

There are some pleasant pages about houses where Manning sometimes lounged on a sofa and told stories against himself. One was about a sculptor, who was doing a bust of him and talking phrenology. Manning asked where "conscientiousness" was; the sculptor stalked across the room, laid a finger on his sitter's head, "That is where it ought to be." As a boy Manning had been a dandy; he was a dapper arch-deacon; as a cardinal he was shabby: indoors he wore a ragged cassock, on state occasions his berretta was apt to be soiled, and his scarlet robe to be faded. In two things he never mortified himself: he kept up hot fires and took his own way. He had a lonely and a sad old age. He was too self-centred to make many intimate friends: the last, Bishop Vaughan of Salford, was far away and often disagreed. He had withdrawn from society—even "Catholic" society, the last to welcome a prelate who was not its leader but its pitiless master—"to devote himself to his priests," who never ventured to come near him unless on pressing business. Sometimes he held perfunctory receptions. If he heard pious or frivolous complaints of them, he cited them to answer the next Monday; and he did not like them to defend themselves, though he was so careful not to have his own good evil spoken of by posterity. He fancied that the reason the London Irish "lapsed" was that they drank; and so he founded the League of the Cross, and the Cardinal's "guards" gave the Cardinal's blessing at meetings in the presence of priests, and the Cardinal congratulated himself that priests who, without being abstainers themselves, presided over branches of a total abstinence league would be afraid to drink to excess. The only result of his other philanthropic enterprises was that he inherited the kind of popularity which Lord Shaftesbury, who had possessed it longer, despised. He was heartily applauded by people who would not do anything for him, least of all go to mass, though they defiled in unexampled numbers past his coffin, and made his funeral even more impressive than Wiseman's, which had been the most impressive since Wellington's. He had not even Lord Shaftesbury's consolation of having conferred solid temporal benefits; his one achievement was, when the new scale of wages at the Docks had been settled and a menacing dispute lingered whether it should come into force in October or January, to get November accepted as a compromise. In his early prime, when he lived with the best, he reproached himself with castle-building; in his old age, when he only saw nobodies, he brooded over addled schemes, and fancied he was laying foundations for eternity.

Possibly, as Cardinal Vaughan affirms in the current number of the Nineteenth Century, a better inspired artist might have drawn a brighter picture, but the gloomy background which looms so large in Mr. Purcell's portrait was surely there. One of Manning's occupations was to compare himself with his contemporaries. He criticised Samuel Wilberforce and Gladstone shrewdly enough, and noted their compromises with the Zeitgeist and their own ambition. He made fewer compromises himself, though, as Denison and Forster noted at two decisive stages of the Education Question, he preferred to evade a contest—where victory was not hopeless. If, as he believed, he was the most upright of the three, he might have said with the Psalmist, "Surely I have cleansed my heart in vain." Mr. Gladstone, after long enjoyment of all "that should accompany old age," has drawn apart, as Browning recommends, "to gather up to the very last the fragments of life's earlier feast," and the fragments would be a rich meal for many. Wilberforce, like Manning, was well gifted for the things of the world and the things of the spirit; and of the two he adjusted them more genially and happily, though neither, it may be, attained to single-minded perfection.

Frances Trollope: Her Life and Literary Work, from George III. to Victoria. By her Daughter-in-law, Frances Eleanor Trollope. (Bentley.)

FRANCES TROLLOPE is now a forgotten novelist to many, for the reading public is every whit as whimsical and as changeable as the public in general. It is, indeed, a question often mooted, whether the rapid movement of thought in these days is not tending towards the gradual obliteration of the three-volume novel. But, from the period of the Reform Act until very recently, the big book was not generally considered a great evil.

The record of Frances Trollope as a writer of fiction, which is in all respects most interesting, is unique in this: that at a time of life when the energies of most persons are on the wane, or are at least so curbed and quieted by household cares and troubles as to render any great change of pursuits and aims all but impossible—in short, at the age of fifty this remarkable woman first entered upon her long and successful literary career. These facts alone are ground for wonder and admiration, and such feelings are intensified when we learn the distressing circumstances under which the novelist prosecuted her almost unending work.

Health and sanity are the two predominant elements in the character of this writer. Without these no amount of learning, imagination, taste or skill would have enabled her at an advanced age to undergo such severe and continuous labour, as, for example, the production of six volumes in one year.

We are not here told anything of her childhood, or how she was educated; but it is evident that the forces of her mind could not have been dulled and weakened by a too formal education in her youth. Hers were not the days of systems, of cramming, and of primers. Her education was doubtless largely derived from intercourse with her father, the Rev. William Milton, who, if we may judge from his letters, was a man of considerable culture and refined literary taste. She wandered untrammelled through the devious ways of knowledge, instead of being led blindly along a "Royal Road."

But while we admire and wonder at the late beginning, and long even tenor of Frances Trollope's literary way, we cannot help suspecting at the same time that, perhaps, in the mute, unglorious morning of her life something may have been left unwritten which might have earned for her a fame more enduring than even those romances which created as great a transitory interest, in their own day, as—shall we say?—The Heavenly Twins or The Sorrows of Satan. But all this is only the idlest speculation.

The book begins, we may say, with the courtship of Frances Milton, by her "sincere admirer and most devoted servant, Thomas Anthony Trollope." A strange courtship, certainly, and an illustration, if illustration were wanted, of the maxim that truth is stranger than fiction. The biographer finds, or fancies she can find, "some subterranean fire beneath the iron-bound crust with which the wooer has chosen to cover it" in a written proposal of marriage, of which I shall here quote a sentence or two. To find anything approaching to warmth in the letter seems to me like an attempt to derive physical heat from the flame of a candle upon a winter's day.

After a long preamble upon the relative advantages and disadvantages of oral and of written declarations, and after a detailed statement of his pecuniary position, Mr. Trollope thus writes:

"I trust, my dear madam, you will not think me presumptuous, or imagine that I have been premature in stating these particulars; for surely if they are worthy of our consideration at any time, it must be more candid to enter into them in the first instance (although the vulgar prejudice of an unthinking mind might lead to a different conclusion) than to be obliged to have recourse to them at a subsequent period. Indeed, I feel no apprehension that my motives will be liable to have an unfavourable construction put upon them by one whose—but let me avoid compliments, which were always my detestation—fit tools only for knaves, and to be employed against fools."

The concluding sentence is still less suggestive of smouldering fires:

"In doing this in the most simple manner, and in rejecting the flippant nonsense which I believe to be commonly used on occasions of this nature, I doubt not I have acted as well in conformity with your sentiments as those of," &c.

Compared with this effusion the celebrated love-letter of Casaubon really does seem almost light and flippant—the two epistles have in general a remarkable resemblance. We are again reminded of Middlemarch by Miss Milton's reply, commencing:

"It does not require three weeks' consideration, Mr. Trollope, to enable me to tell you that the letter you left with me last night was most flattering and gratifying to me. I value your good opinion too highly not to feel that the generous proof you have given me of it must for ever, and in any event, be remembered by me with pride and gratitude."

There was much sadness in Mrs. Trollope's married life. Failure seemed to dog the footsteps of her husband all his days. At one time a barrister in fair practice, all his business gradually slipped away. The pinch of poverty was felt in the household; old shoes and trousers had to be patched and mended, because there was no money to buy new ones. Affairs were made worse rather than better by a trip to America, where a mercantile speculation, intended to retrieve their fortunes, ended in complete failure.

But trials more bitter even than these had to be borne: terrible family dissensions between Mr. Trollope and his son Henry; scenes where the mother was called in to mediate between them, and became herself so shaken and agitated as to be obliged sometimes to have recourse to a dose of laudanum to procure a night's rest. The deplorable irritability of temper, amounting almost to insanity, which Mr. Trollope suffered from in latter years has been described by his son, T. A. Trollope, in a work entitled What I Remember, and is there attributed partly to the habitual use of calomel.

Frances Trollope brought with her from the United States two volumes of American Notes, which were published in 1832. Her husband also conceived the idea of writing a book, the title of which is very suggestive of "the key to all the mythologies," it was "An Encyclopædia Ecclesiastica, or a complete history of the Church, containing a full and compendious explanation of all ecclesiastical rites and ceremonies; a distinct and accurate account of all denominations of Christians, from the earliest ages to the present time, together with a definition of terms usually occurring in ecclesiastical writers."

The unlucky author died before the completion of the work, of which one volume alone was published by John Murray in 1832.

For some time before the death of her husband Frances Trollope had been the bread-winner of the family. Although a lover of literature, she worked not so much for name and fame as that her children might have bread. How she could accomplish the writing of a novel amid the most distracting cares is a marvel to weaker mortals. But the history of literature contains many similar instances. One of her novels, Tremorlyn Cliff, was written, we may almost say, by the bedside of a dying son. She could not abate her work because money was urgently needed. The following extract from a letter is most pathetic:

"I wait to hear from you that something near £100 is due from Mr. Murray, and when I know this, I will write to him stating the simple fact, and asking his permission to draw for that sum. . . . Learn if possible how the sale goes on. It is dreadful to think that dear Henry's life may depend on it!"

What an iron frame this woman must have had; what an indomitable will, and, better than all, what a tender and loving heart; her sympathies extend even beyond her own children, for we find her gentle care and solicitude bestowed upon others also.

Her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Anthony Trollope, bears testimony to this, writing in 1844, shortly after her marriage:

"Nothing could have been kinder or more affectionate than the way she received me—kind, good, loving, then and ever afterwards. No one who saw her at this date could suppose that she was in her sixty-fourth year, so full was she of energy. There was no one so eager to suggest, and to carry out the suggestions, as to mountain excursions, picnics, and so forth. And she was always the life and soul of the party, with her cheerful conversation and her wit. She rose very early, and made her own tea, the fire having been prepared over night (on one occasion I remember her bringing me a cup of tea to my room, because she thought I had caught cold during a wet walk in the mountains), then sat at her writing-table until the allotted task of so many pages was completed, and was usually on the lawn before the breakfast-bell rang, having filled her basket with cuttings from the rose-bushes for the table and drawing-room decorations."

She lived to see many marked changes in the social life of her country. She had watched the development of railways, the sure encroachment of machinery over hand-labour. A new England had grown up before her eyes. In a novel called Town and Country, she graphically describes rural England at the commencement of this century:

"Those who have lived long enough to remember what the manners of the middle-classes were in the more remote counties, before the invention of steam-boats and railroads had caused them to be jumbled altogether till every trace of rural freshness was rubbed off, might fix upon less interesting periods for the employment of a gossiping pen."

Πάντα πέει! one may well exclaim upon reading these lines, for now the mighty force of steam, then so new and so strange, has been all but superseded by a power mightier, more mysterious. What greater marvels are yet in store for us, who can tell? But through all change the human heart remains the same eternal mystery, from age to age. It is as a human record that this work is the most valuable; for this biography, like all biographies that are truthfully and faithfully drawn, enables the reader to look out upon the external world, as it were, through a mind other than his own. Here we have the record of a mind strong, patient, loving, earnest; thorough in its love and hatred; never lukewarm, but full of humanising prejudices; never fearing to uphold the right or to declaim against wrong.

Frances Trollope never possessed sufficient leisure for the production of perfect work, and so, perhaps, cannot be classed among our great writers. She was something, however, more admirable, more worthy of love and praise—she was, in the highest sense, a good woman.

TWO BOOKS ON EDUCATION.

Introduction to the Pedagogy of Herbart. By Chr. Ufer. Authorised Translation from the Fifth German Edition, under the auspices of the Herbart Club. By J. C. Zinzer. Edited by Charles de Garmo, Ph.D. (Isbister.)

The Educational Ideal: An Outline of its Growth in Modern Times. By James P. Munro. (Isbister.)

THE first of these books may be described as almost a classical introduction to an educational classic. The examples to illustrate Herbart's positions are chiefly German. Mr. and Mrs. Felkin, to whose Introduction to Herbart I drew attention in the ACADEMY of October 12, 1895, supplied their copious examples chiefly from English sources. For students of Herbart it will not be superfluous to suggest that they should read both Ufer's German Introduction, now translated, and Felkins' English Introduction; they are both valuable and lightgiving. The study of the pedagogy of Herbart is sufficiently difficult to require that all real helps should be enlisted in the service of the beginner. The only remark to be made is, that Herbart as an educational writer is worth taking trouble over, and that we are thankful for Mr. and Mrs. Felkin's book, for Zinzer's translation of Ufer, and also for the book of Ufer's editor, Dr. de Garmo, whose Herbart and the Herbartians gives a lucid account of the continuators of Herbart's work in Germany.

It cannot be repeated too often that the position of Herbart among educational writers is extremely high. I ventured to suggest, when the translation of Herbart's Science of Education first appeared in England, that to equal his magnificence of conception of the idea of education we must, historically, go back to the famous Tractate of John Milton. They are, it is true, very different. Milton's Tractate is on the literary side as far superior to Herbart as it is pedagogically inferior. And most people's sympathies are with literature rather than pedagogy.

But what is to be said of a book which professes to trace the educational ideal in modern times, and omits to treat prominently both Milton and Herbart? Chapters in Mr. Munro's book are devoted to Rabelais, Francis Bacon, Comenius, Montaigne and Locke, the Jansenists, and Fénelon, Rousseau, Pestalozzi, Froebel, and "Women in Education"; but no chapter to Milton, no chapter to Herbart. Milton is indeed spoken of in the chapter on Rabelais, but he is relegated to a note. As to Herbart, Mr. Munro says:

"Herbart . . . I have neglected only because he is of that body of German philosophers which it has been necessary to exclude from the plan of this outline, founds his pedagogics upon a broad and serious philosophy in contrast with which Froebel's psychological fancies seem childish indeed."

And yet of the movement connected with Froebel Mr. Munro says:

"By it the last serf of civilisation, the child, is being made free, and is taking his place in the scheme of the universe as a great, if not the greatest, factor of human progress. By it and through him man and woman are learning the true significance of life . . ." &c.

This does not seem to leave much room for Herbart's "broad and serious philosophy," beside which "Froebel's psychological fancies seem childish indeed." At any rate, it increases the curiosity for a presentment of Herbart, even if it should lead the writer to the "body of German philosophers" excluded from the work. For, be it noted, though Mr. Munro excludes this important topic from his plan, he does not indicate this on his title-page. There he offers "the educational ideal: an outline of its growth in modern times." After which it is hardly in keeping to exclude "broad and serious philosophy" in favour of what he calls (comparatively) "psychological fancies . . . which are childish indeed."

This, then, is a criticism to which Mr. Munro's book is liable. In tracing "the educational ideal" he omits special treatment of two of the most prominent of the personal factors in its development. He may, for reasons of his own, be justified in this, but he necessarily loses in historical perspective by so doing.

Then, again, his chapter on "Women in Education" seems to be erroneously entitled. For Mr. Munro means by the term women writers on education. In previous chapters he has taken men educators. He evidently thinks he ought now, from a sense of fairness, to give a turn to women. But the truth is, that in tracing the educational ideal, the distinction of sex vanishes as completely as that of nationality. However, Mr. Munro draws the line of boundary against philosophical educationists, whilst he includes women-educationists as a class. He distinguishes "women in education" as the promoters of the idea that "education leads to and from the family; the home is its unit." Yet Mr. Munro would himself admit that it is Friedrich Froebel who appealed to all fathers and mothers: "Come let us live with our children," and therefore supplied the very ideal assigned by Mr. Munro to women. If we took women's education as a subject of special study, historically, we should have to recall that Vivès, Roger Ascham, Mulcaster, John Amos Comenius, John Dury, Fénelon—to mention only well-known names—were conspicuous advocates of the higher education of women. In our own days, when women's education has made such bounds, it would be absurd to say that it has been a women's movement only. It is truer to facts to say that it has been an educational movement. All thinkers on education, men or women, help to form the educational ideal, not as men or women, but in so far as they are sound thinkers. There is not an article which can be labelled men's education and another women's education, the one supplied by one firm and the other by the other, the two firms having no connexion with each other.

I may seem to be caricaturing Mr. Munro. I by no means wish to suggest that he puts the case in so broad a form as I am doing. But I strongly feel that to make a special chapter for women educators inevitably leads to a wrong conception of education as a whole. To do so in a work devoted to tracing the development of the educational ideal is illogical and misleading. It needs an emphatic protest.

The omission of philosophers and psychologists of this century in stating the educational ideal and the treatment of women as an educational class, I look upon as cardinal defects. But I should be sorry to leave the impression that Mr. Munro's book is without merits. He gives interesting and stimulating accounts of the above-named "heroes" as types and leaders in educational progress. He compares and contrasts educationists often skilfully and suggestively. He tries, and usually with marked success, to get at the essential nature of the contribution of each reformer to educational progress. Lastly, he supplies a bibliography in connexion with each chapter.

NEW NOVELS.

Comedies of Courtship. By Anthony Hope. (Innes.)

The Brown Ambassador. By Mrs. Hugh Fraser. (Macmillans.)

Pinches of Salt. By F. M. Allen. (Downey.)

The Paying Guest. By George Gissing. (Cassells.)

Pierrot. By H. de Vere Stackpoole. (John Lane.)

The Ordeal of Thomas Taffler. By Henry Murray. (Ward & Downey.)

Monte Carlo Stories. By Joan Barrett. (Chatto & Windus.)

A Trial and its Issues. By W. Charles. (Fisher Unwin.)

A Monk of Fifo. By Andrew Lang. (Longmans.)

PUBLISHERS a few years ago must have been very stupid, or else Anthony Hope composes with amazing rapidity. Every month seems to bring us a new story by this brilliant young novelist. In these circumstances it is, of course, discreet and kindly of the envious critic to caution an author against careless writing and rapid publication. Any number of worthy and stereotyped warning phrases cry aloud for quotation. A reluctant honesty, however, condemns one to acknowledge that, be these stories recently evolved or old ones rescued from the drawers of the writing-table, they are uncommonly good. Indeed, since the Dolly Dialogues, that tantalising and wholly delightful little masterpiece, their creator has invented nothing so admirable as his Courtship Comedies. Anthony Hope is invariably at his best in these wise and witty trifles, so easy to read, so hard to forget, requiring such certainty and cunning of touch. His more ambitious works—always excellent and ingenious, it is true—are not without fatal errors in construction. The Prisoner of Zenda hardly convinces; even the powerful God in the Car is at times a sleep-provoking deity; but Mr. Witt's Widow is always brilliant company. Comedies of Courtship are as witty, naughty, and fascinating as that adorable little lady. Here is a great compliment, which their heroines—Miss Travers, Dora Bellairs, and Miss Glyn—will fully appreciate.

Mrs. Fraser has nearly succeeded in writing a thoroughly fascinating book. But she has not quite succeeded. Mrs. Melodrama is a dear old soul whom we all love and respect, but sometimes she does not "mix" well with the company. A horrible blunder was committed when she was invited to the Brown Ambassador's party. The lunatic lady, the vengeful old aunt, the wicked butler, have no qualities to recommend them, even their badness is uninteresting and traditional. They are distinctly in the way and waste valuable time. As for the lost will, it is too old a nuisance to be tolerated. Putting these defects on one side, The Brown Ambassador is a book of unique charm. There is poetic and grotesque fancy in the history of the journey of the sick King of the Dachs-hounds, high comedy in the interviews between Her Serene Highness the Cat Princess and His Excellency; above all, sympathetic and admirably penetrating knowledge of children, so that the scenes in which Fenella, Conny, and Donald take the lead are better and wiser than merely diverting. As for the Ambassador himself, he is a conceited, crafty, rather unscrupulous, delightful old humbug, who at the end deserves and attains the grand order of the Dog-Star. May he wear it many a year! Mrs. Fraser must stick to her fancies and her children: portraying them she is an accomplished mistress of a rare and beautiful talent. But she must beware of melodrama, for in that kind she is a clumsy craftsman.

They who like F. M. Allen's humour have no cause to sneeze at Pinches of Salt. The book is amusing enough, though some of the stories are rather laboured. Still, there are plenty of spontaneous jests to contrast with their more ponderous cousins. In "Silver Sand" a pathetic note is sounded with considerable skill. On the whole, this collection is as good as anything its author has yet done.

Mr. Gissing's new story will surprise many of his admirers; I trust it will not alienate them. It is very short, and very amusing. As a rule, his novels are lengthy and lugubrious, the reader not objecting to these sombre qualities because of the gripping power and notable sincerity evident on every page. Strength and truth are again apparent; the lightness of touch, the "fun" of the new story are the astonishing revelations. Yet there is pathos in the book for those who have eyes to see, pathos none the less real because only hinted at. Miss Derrick, the paying guest, is drawn by a master hand. No doubt the prosaically worthy couple at "Runnymede" found her a great nuisance while she stayed with them at their magnificently named suburban villa. One can feel a good deal of sympathy for them, but they who interpret the story acutely will think still more kindly of the unfortunate young woman. Even Mr. Gissing will find it hard to equal The Paying Guest. It is a subtle study of human nature, an excellent bit of writing and composition.

Mr. Stackpoole's Pierrot is curious, clever, yet not wholly satisfactory. He writes excellently: each word has a definite value, is neatly chosen. The impending catastrophe is skilfully suggested from the first; a mysterious haunting atmosphere closes round the reader. Mr. Stackpoole can amuse, excite, thrill. Strangely enough, though endowed with these powers, he cannot always convince. I have sought patiently for words wherewith to explain my verdict. I have not found any. I can only record my own impression for what it is worth. Yet the story has an extraordinary charm, imagination, style. The descriptions of the German soldiers passing the park gates on their way to Paris, of the old corporal of the Grand Army drunken and broken-hearted, of the gentle figure of the poor young count, of the song of the faun, these belong to literature, and literature of a fine quality.

Mr. Henry Murray's little story is interesting, if slight. A natural style, some command of humour and pathos, and a very real sympathy with his hero, combine to make the reader's time slip by pleasantly and satisfactorily. The method is old-fashioned, but direct; the tone healthy. No more need be said; but of many more pompous experiments one cannot truthfully say so much.

Miss Joan Barrett is, it would seem, a beginner. Her stories appeared in Pearson's Weekly, and, on the whole, are worth a more permanent form. A fair level is maintained throughout; the style, if undistinguished, is careful; and some of the sketches, as "Kismet" and "The Mystery of Villa Francoisy," have more than mere negative merits.

Unfortunately it is impossible to praise A Trial and its Issues. Some people may like this sort of thing; readers of the ACADEMY will scarcely be among the number. The grammar is bad, Americanisms of the "it is just impossible" type are beyond forgiveness, and the plot is prodigiously impossible.

Historical novels have become so fashionable that it were vain to offer reasons against them. To some they will always seem lame fiction and perverted history; to others arguments in their favour trip readily from the tongue. Whichever side in the controversy be right, it is clear at the present moment that neither party will be easily persuaded. Some of the more famous names among contemporary novelists rely on this kind of romance for their chief honour, and the greater public takes kindly, nay eagerly, to the food provided for them. Mr. Andrew Lang is so versatile, wields so ready and ingenious a pen, that it is not astonishing to find him in the lists. He is well equipped too, knowing a great deal of history, having a brain richly stored with old legends; moreover, he is a poet and a lover of poetry. Whatever the subject he chooses, he is ever among the first in his handling of it: on his own special studies he is beyond the reach, if not the envy, of rivals. So A Monk of Fife, his latest task, is well done, full of incident, imagery, and quaint conceits. The style adopted is, perhaps, too faithfully copied from the manner of older chroniclers to be quite as easy reading as it should be. One wishes now and then that the title-page had borne the legend, "Done into Modern English." But only a very foolish person will venture to dispute Mr. Lang's right to do as seemed best to him; and those who read his story will get all, and more than all, they could reasonably expect of excitement and romance. The book is good of its kind, which is what it aims at being. Consequently anything but praise of it were unreasonable, and discourteous to a greatly accomplished author.

PERCY ADDLESHAW.

SOME VOLUMES OF VERSE.

Arrows of Song. (Hutchinson.) The author of Arrows of Song desires—so we are informed by the publisher's announcement—no publicity as a writer of verse. From the same source we gather that he is a well-known provider of prose. If we were timid critics, we should not relish this position; but as we are accustomed to deal in candour without adulterating it by the inclusion of spite, we welcome this opportunity of considering the merit of a volume while its author's big name is kept discreetly hidden from our knowledge; for thus we shall certainly disarm the suspicions of such onlookers as believe in a general state of corruption among reviewers, supposing them to be merely industrious rollers of logs. With regard to Arrows of Song the question at once arises, Is there any special reason why the singer of these songs should stoop behind the hedge of anonymity? Does his whim, or his discretion, drive him to adopt this humble attitude? Whenever we read about arrows it is difficult not to think of targets; and as soon as we saw the title of this book advertised we leaped to the conclusion that we were to be entertained by versified comments upon prominent living minstrels. Rumours supported this supposition. What is the actual state of affairs? The volume is quite innocent of parody, and only one target is aimed at. In the poem entitled "My Enemy" the author has not been sparing of literary gall and wormwood. We are bound to say that after reading these most bitter verses, which are obviously directed against a man of mark, we are surprised to find their writer devoid of the necessary pluck to sign his name to the attack. To dress up in a cloak and mask for the purpose of pelting foes with unsavoury missiles is a proceeding which does not commend itself to the average male. Thank God for that. Anonymous fun may pass; anonymous malice is, so to speak, a horse of another hue. And now, leaving this part of our subject with a right good will, it is time to spare a few words for the arrows remaining in this quiver. Among the thirteen other poems there are several which charm by passages made up of metrical skill and beautiful expression, though we search in vain for extended excellence. When poetry gives out, the author does not hesitate to employ prose; and as the former not infrequently withholds assistance to the rhymers, it follows that we are obliged to read more of the wrong stuff than of the right. Perhaps the most satisfactory exercise submitted to us is "Lulu," despite of the fact that the subject has been worn threadbare by lyrical predecessors. Other pieces which deserve notice are "Nelson Day" and "The Coming of Keats." Here follow two verses from the latter:

"O Keats-Endymion! thou beloved youth,
Whom but to think of is to threnodise,
And evermore to bow to in amaze
For all thou wert in thine enchanted days,
I kneel to thee, sweet spirit! in the truth
Of all thy teachings, merged in many sighs.

"By moonlight and by starlight I am thine—
If one unfit to touch thy lyre divine
May dare to call thee brother for a space.
In whispering winds I hear thee, as I deem;
And in my slumber, like a silent dream,
I seem to see the outline of thy face!"

A Sextet of Singers. By George Barlow, J. A. Blaikie, "Paganus" (L. Cranmer Byng), Vincent O'Sullivan, Walter Herries Pollock, and Sidney R. Thompson. (The Roxburghe Press.) A certain strain is put upon the reviewer when he finds himself confronted with the task of considering half-a-dozen singing gentlemen in a paragraph. Before we arrive at professional comment, we feel constrained to chronicle our anxiety with regard to the possible fruit of the example of this poetical band. Six is not likely to remain as the extreme number in such progressive days as these; and now that the ground is broken by these explorers, we fully expect to have abundant crops of versifiers, twelve or twenty at a time. It is not an exhilarating prospect. A Sextet of Singers opens with some eloquent contributions from the pen, or lyre, of Mr. George Barlow, who is first in merit as he is first in position. Mr. Barlow is no novice where beauty of language and impetuous rhythms are concerned, and those who have been moved by former examples of his skill will surely not be disappointed by the perusal of the six poems by which he is here represented. We quote a couple of stanzas from "A Song of the Sea":

"Nought can turn aside the singer from the loves that lure his praise,
From the gold-tressed wood-nymph smiling underneath the tangled sprays,
From the red-lipped Naled laughing with a mouth where summer burns,
From the maiden stepping gently through the flowers and clinging ferns.

"Virgin ever, unexhausted, are the great sea's loving arms.
Who hath ever wholly won her, who hath numbered all her charms?
Who hath said 'I am her bridegroom, she for me alone is fair,'
Lifting star by star her jewels from the midnight of her hair?"

The remaining minstrels can easily be disposed of in a few sentences of commendation, for while they keep an excellent average they bring forward nothing actually remarkable. Mr. Pollock—five of whose pieces will amply repay attention—has passed, quite unaccountably, two most indifferent lines. Mr. O'Sullivan's "Christmas Cradle Song" is very much to our taste, though we cannot help regretting what we consider to be the unwarrantable intrusion of a word which will be untranslatable by ninety-nine mothers out of a hundred. The verb in question is "to blip."

Ballads of Boy and Beak. By C. E. Johnstone. (John Lane.) With the increase of population the struggle to secure bread and cheese becomes harder and harder. It may be asserted as a general rule that the sterner the effort to support existence the grimmer becomes the labourer, and the less likely there is to be produced among us men of irrepressible gaiety: men who will turn with enthusiasm to the jolly task of amusing the world. We are sadly in need of merry minstrels who will compel us to hold our sides, or, at least, to display a very decided enjoyment of their drolleries. Weeks, months, years pass; but the rhyming wag, whose advent we wait to bless, fails to arrive. In the meanwhile divers candidates for our smiles appear and set forth their wares; but, to our thinking, their fun belongs more to contrivance than to native mirth. The latest arrival among those who would lay claim to the bays of jocosity is Mr. C. E. Johnstone, who sings in very spirited fashion, though not without compelling us to feel that he is forcing himself to be amusing, of boys and masters, canes and impositions. Much of Ballads of Boy and Beak can be read with pleasure; and if only Mr. Johnstone showed signs of being inexorably driven from within to express himself in rhyme, we should be able to record an ungrudging verdict in his favour. But his verses are often stiff. There is too much of the common-room in them, too little of the playground. Now this stiffness, this want of nimble movement, is peculiarly unfortunate in poems which relate to such easy-going, unfettered creatures as boys. As if heaviness of touch were not enough to produce dissatisfaction in a reader, Mr. Johnstone has actually put the doings of his pupils into rondeaus, pantoums, and villanelles, thus patting mere manufacture on the back while giving inspiration the cold shoulder. We are left with a sense of restraint, as may well be imagined. If there is cause for a hearty burst of laughter in the whole of the book, we have failed to discover it. It behoves us to add that one or two of the parodies are really capital fooling.

London Visions. First Book. By Laurence Binyon. (Elkin Mathews.) Most certainly Mr. Laurence Binyon deserves to be bracketed with Abou Ben Adhem, and should be written down by the angel as a man who loves his fellow men, especially if they inhabit Whitechapel or any other part of the mightiest of all cities. It seems to be Mr. Binyon's ambition to discover his themes in the streets of London: to adventure forth by day or by night full of a desire to be hail-fellow-wall-met with as many of his kind as possible, and to share with them both joy and grief. Though this is a laudable, and even a beautiful mission, Mr. Binyon, who has the root of poetry in him, must be observant lest he deteriorate from the genuine bard to the philanthropist with a camera; for we are obliged to consider some of his London Visions more as verbal photographs than as examples of successful singing. At present his mental attitude is far more admirable than his attempts at its translation to the printed page, though signs of loving care are as abundant as the numerous eloquent passages. To our thinking, Mr. Binyon is not infrequently unlucky in his choice of the form which is to hold his subject. For example, take "The Little Dancers," a poem which strikes us as rather heavy when we remember the nature of the theme:

"Lonely, save for a few faint stars, the sky Dreams; and lonely, below, the little street
Into its gloom retires, secluded and shy.
Scarcely the dumb roar enters this soft retreat;
And all is dark, save where come flooding rays
From a tavern window: there, to the brisk measure
Of an organ that down in an alley merrily plays,
Two children, all alone and no one by,
Holding their tattered frocks, through an airy maze
Of motion, lightly threaded with nimble feet,
Dance sedately: face to face they gaze,
Their eyes shining, grave with a perfect pleasure."

In this particular case we can see no good reason why the measure should not have been the ally of the subject. We are not pleading for an abandoned jig. There is a middle course. These few lines will be evidence that our remark as to photography was neither unjust nor uncalled for. The following extract contains more of the true stuff:

"But thou, divine moon, with thine equal beam,
Dispensing patience, stealest unawares
The thoughts of many that pass sorrowful on Else undiverted, amid the crowd alone:
Embroiderest with beauty the worn theme
Of trouble; to a fancied harbour calm
Steerest the widow's ship of heavy cares;
And on light spirits of lovers, radiant grown,
Dropest an unimaginable balm.
Yet me to-night thy peace rejoices less Than this warm human scene, that of rude earth
Pleasantly savours, nor dissembles mirth,
Nor grief, nor passion: sweet to me this press
Of life unnumbered, where if hard distress
Be tyrant, hunger is not fed
Nor misery pensioned with the ill-tasting bread
Of pity; but such help as Earth ordains
Betwixt her creatures, bound in common pains,
Brother from brother, without prayer, obtains."

In the last five lines it will be noticed that poetic license makes short work of fact. Mr. Binyon seems to think that the children of poor neighbourhoods do not enjoy their games in the mire. This is a mistake. They have their intensities of enjoyment equally with the little folks in a far-away village.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMAN will publish shortly a new volume of biographical and critical studies of nineteenth century literature, by Mr. Edmund Gosse, to be entitled Critical Kit-Cats. Among the writers treated are Edward Fitzgerald, Walt Whitman, Lord de Tabley, R. L. Stevenson, Christina Rossetti, and Walter Pater.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co. announce their intention to publish a series of translations of foreign military works, to be called the "Wolseley Series," under the editorship of Captain Walter H. James. The first volume, to appear shortly, will be Letters on Strategy, by the late Prince Kraft-Hohenlohe-Mgelfingen, with a preface by Lord Wolseley. Two other volumes are also in the press: With the Royal Headquarters in 1870-71, by General Verdy du Vernois; and Napoleon as a Strategist, by Count Yorck von Wartenberg.

MR. GEORGE REDWAY will publish early in March two military books: The Soldier in Battle, or Life in the Ranks of the Army of the Potomac, by Mr. Frank Wilkeson, a survivor of Grant's last campaign; and Eighty Years Ago, or the Recollections of an old Army Doctor, by the late Dr. Gibney, of Cheltenham, edited by his son, Major Gibney. The latter book gives an account of the battle-fields of Quatre Bras and Waterloo, and of the occupation of Paris.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL announce an historical sketch of Bohemia, by Francis Count Lützow, a large landowner, and formerly a deputy for Bohemia in the Austrian Parliament.

MESSRS. BLACKIE & SON will publish shortly an English translation of the late Dr. A. E. Brehm's Vom Nordpol zum Äquator. The book consists of a collection of pictures of wild life, scenery, and travel in various parts of the world, especially Asia and Africa. It is enriched with full-page and other illustrations, in which feature the English edition will be superior to the German. It has been edited by Mr. J. Arthur Thomson, who contributes an introductory essay and numerous notes.

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK have in the press an English translation of Prof. Adolf Harnack's Christianity and History. It has been made, with the author's sanction, by Mr. T. Bailey Saunders, who will also prefix an introductory note.

THE second series of Mrs. L. T. Meade's "Stories from the Diary of a Doctor," which appeared in the Strand Magazine for 1895, will be published in book form next month by Messrs. Bliss, Sands & Foster.

MESSRS. A. D. INNES & Co. will publish in the course of this spring a new novel by the author of "Ant Diabolus, ant Nihil," to be entitled The Limb, the scene of which is laid among Court circles in St. Petersburg.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. will publish shortly The Oracle of Baal, a romance of adventure in Africa, by Mr. J. Provand Webster, with illustrations by Mr. Warwick Goble.

MESSRS. JARROLD & SONS announce the two following novels in their "Greenback Series": Lindsay's Girl, by Mrs. Herbert Martin; and Harum Scarum, by Miss Esmé Stuart.

Christ in Hades, by Mr. Stephen Phillips, will immediately follow Mr. Robert Bridges's volume in the "Elkin Mathews Shilling Garland." Mr. Phillips's name may be remembered as that of the actor whose delivery of the Ghost's speech in "Hamlet" at the Globe Theatre, during F. R. Benson's lease, won him a call—a unique distinction for the Ghost in the history of the stage.

MR. LEWIS H. VICTORY will publish through Mr. Elliot Stock very shortly a new volume of verse, entitled The Higher Teaching of Shakespeare.

MR. LEONARD SMITHERS will issue early in March a volume of verse by Mr. A. Bernard Miall, entitled Nocturns and Pastorals.

MR. ALFRED COOPER, of Charing Cross-road, proposes to issue, in a limited edition, a Life of John Leland, printed from a MS. formerly in the collection of Sir Thomas Phillips. The authorship is unknown, but it has been attributed to Edward Burton, who is mentioned in Hearne's Diary. A bibliography will be appended of the works of Leland, including those that are still in MS.

THE Selden Society is about to issue to the members vol. ix. of its publications, being the volume for 1895. This consists of a selection from the Coroners' Rolls in the Public Record Office from 1265 to 1413 A.D., with an introduction on the history of the office of Coroner by Dr. Gross, of Harvard. The volume for 1896 will be Select Cases in Chancery from the Time of Richard II.; a portion of this is already in the press.

A REPORT on the conference at Ottawa on the Copyright question, at which Mr. Hall Caine and Mr. Daldy were present on behalf of English interests, has been published as an appendix to the annual report of the Canadian Minister of Agriculture for 1895.

ON Thursday next, at the Royal Institution, the Rev. Dr. William Barry, author of The New Antigone, will begin a course of four lectures on "Masters of Modern Thought," dealing with Voltaire, Rousseau, Goethe, and Spinoza.

AT a meeting of the Elizabethan Literary Society, to be held at Toynbee Hall on Wednesday next, the president, Mr. Sidney Lee, will read a paper on "An Elizabethan Bookseller."

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

PROF. J. J. THOMSON, professor of experimental physics, has been appointed by the Vice-Chancellor to deliver the Rede Lecture at Cambridge this year.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE has been elected vice-chancellor of the University of London, in place of the late Sir Julian Goldsmid; and Mr. Victor Dickens has been appointed to succeed Mr. Milman as registrar.

THE series of alternative resolutions regarding degrees for women will be discussed and voted upon in Congregation at Oxford on Tuesday next. In accordance with a memorial signed by 104 members, an additional resolution has been added to those originally proposed, by which a woman may receive a diploma, stating the examination she has passed and the place at which she has studied. At this stage no amendment can be moved; and whatever resolution be passed, a select committee will have to be appointed later on to report on the provisions of a draft statute. Among the memorials printed in the Gazette, we observe that the thirty-five headmistresses under the Girls' Public Day Schools Company are all, with one notable exception, in favour of the B.A. degree; as also are eighteen out of twenty-four headmistresses under the Church Schools Company.

AT Cambridge the discussion on degrees for women took place on Wednesday of this week.

The next stage will be the appointment of a syndicate, to consider the whole question; and to this it is, probable that there will be no serious opposition.

THE Senate at Cambridge has granted Prof. Jebb leave of absence during Easter term, in order to enable him to discharge his duties in Parliament.

THE Board of Trinity College, Dublin, have decided to republish Sir W. Rowan Hamilton's Elements of Quaternions, and have entrusted the task of editing the work to Mr. Charles J. Joly, fellow of Trinity, who will also add annotations.

MESSRS. A. & C. Black announce Studies in Judaism, by Mr. S. Schechter, reader in Rabbinate at Cambridge.

ON Wednesday of this week, the Rev. Dr. C. H. H. Wright, Grinfield lecturer at Oxford on the Septuagint, delivered his terminal lecture, on "The Seventy Weeks of Daniel (LXX. and Hebrew), considered in relation to Modern Criticism."

THE Rev. J. E. Odgers, Hibbert lecturer in ecclesiastical history at Mansfield College, proposes to deliver three public lectures on "Ecclesiastical History," illustrated with diagrams and lantern-slides. He will deal with the early cemeteries and inscriptions at Rome, and the early art of Ravenna.

THE accounts of the colleges at Cambridge have been printed as a supplement to the University Reporter. A considerable want of uniformity is still observable. In the great majority of cases the financial year ends at Michaelmas; in three or four cases in October; in one case on Lady Day; in another on St. Thomas's Day. So, again, abatement of rents is in one case entered as a deduction from income; in another as an item of expenditure. It is interesting to learn that a larger amount is universally expended on the chapel than on the library. For example, at Trinity, out of the corporate income, only £1461 is appropriated to the library, compared with £2112 for the chapel, and £2792 for the augmentation of benefices.

THE expenditure on the restoration of St. Mary's spire at Oxford already amounts to £11,633. The architect, Mr. T. G. Jackson, hopes that the work may be completed by the end of January, 1897. Meanwhile, the University has resolved to appropriate to this account all sums received by way of composition for university dues for a further period of two years.

THE following have been elected fellows of University College, London: Mr. G. F. Blacker, Miss Clara E. Collet, Mrs. Rhys Davids, Mr. T. G. Foster, Mr. H. F. Heath, Mr. A. W. Porter, Mr. W. B. Ransom, and Mr. A. G. Tanaley.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

PAN.

HUSH! Pan is sleeping
In forest deep on leafy bed:
Oh, softly tread.
Hum lullaby, O drowsy bee:
In charmed silence every tree
His watch is keeping.

Oh, softly tread: great Pan is sleeping.

Hark! Pan is waking!
A shiver through the leaves is creeping
Before the breeze.

Oh, see the Hamadryads peeping
Behind the trees.

Their trunks glow ruddy in the sun,
And hark! the blackbirds one by one
The silence breaking

With flute-like note; for Pan is waking.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE current number of the Jewish Quarterly Review (Macmillan) opens with an obituary of Joseph Derenbourg, by Dr. Neubauer, who writes as a friend of nearly forty years' standing. Then follows a lecture delivered by Mr. Claude Montefiore before the Theological Society of the University of Glasgow last November, entitled "On Some Misconceptions of Judaism and Christianity by each other." But it is really more than this; for not the least interesting part is an estimate of the several ingredients which Judaism and Christianity have each contributed to that Theism which is the working belief of so many of the best modern minds. While scrupulously fair to Christianity, Mr. Montefiore certainly brings out a good deal in Judaism which will be novel even to thoughtful readers. In the same connexion we may mention a study of Jowett's religious teaching, as exemplified in his college sermons, by Mr. Oswald Simon. Prof. D. Kaufmann gives a lurid picture of the fate that befell Jewish informers in the middle ages. It appears that, in Spain at any rate, the state used to lend its sanction to death sentences passed upon informers by the Jewish community in accordance with Talmudic law. Maimuni, writing in Egypt, states that in the cities of the West the punishment of informers was a matter of daily occurrence. Of the actual procedure, few records have been recorded. But Prof. Kaufmann here prints, in Hebrew, the Responsum of a German Rabbi, approving the execution of a Spanish informer circa 1283. Unfortunately, he does not tell us precisely what was the special treason against their co-religionists that these informers committed. Mr. F. C. Conybeare begins an elaborate attempt to restore the archetype of the Armenian Version of the Testaments of Reuben and Simeon, by means of a comparison with the Greek MSS. collated by Mr. Sinker; Mr. S. Schechter concludes his corrections and notes of the Midrashic treatise entitled Agadath Shir Hashirim; and the Rev. G. Margoliouth prints and translates, from a MS. in the British Museum, the Megillath Misraim, a liturgical document commemorating the deliverance of the Jews at Cairo in 1524, which has hitherto supposed to have been lost. Two ladies, Mrs. Henry Lucas and Miss Nina Davis, contribute some effective renderings of Hebrew poetry. Passing over the reviews for want of space, we must not omit all mention of the "Massoretic Studies" of Prof. Ludwig Blau, of Buda-Pest. He subjects to a minute examination the well-known Talmudic custom of counting the number of letters and words in the Bible. The former was the older practice of the two. But strange variations are found in different calculations, which are here explained as clerical errors. Considering the importance attached to the matter, it seems odd that the Rabbis should give 600,000 and 400,000 for the number of letters in the Pentateuch, whereas the actual total can easily be ascertained to be just 300,000.

SLAVICA.

The Bulgarski Priegled ("Bulgarian Review"), which we are glad to see continues its successful career, contains among other interesting articles one by Dr. Shishmanov, of Sofia, the son-in-law of the lamented Prof. Dragomanov, on the valuable MSS. of Schafarik which are preserved in the Bohemian Museum at Prague, and are still unpublished. Attention is especially called to the important material collected by that distinguished scholar on the ethnology, language, and literature of the Bulgarians. When Schafarik published his History of Slavonic Literature in 1826, the Bulgarian language was so little known in Europe that he treated it as a dialect of Serbian. But on taking up his quarters at Neusatz, where he had an official appointment at the Gymnasium, he began his study of the Bulgarian language and literature, and thenceforth was occupied with it off and on till his death in 1861. His MSS. were purchased by the Municipal Council of Prague, and were afterwards placed in the Museum. During, however, the life of the late librarian, Vrtatko, everything in the Museum seems to have been allowed to remain in a state of confusion, and persons who expressed a wish to see the MSS. were put off with various excuses. However, matters have changed under the régime of Dr. Patera, the present holder of the office; and an edition of the correspondence of Schafarik is being prepared by Prof. Jireček, so well known for his History of Bulgaria, and his work on the Principality since its emancipation from the yoke of the Turks.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LITHUANIAN BIBLE.

Cambridge: Feb. 5, 1896.

In the ACADEMY of 1891 (vol. xxxix., pp. 370, 443, 467, 514, 564), and more recently in 1895 (November 30, p. 461), certain circumstances connected with the Lithuanian Bible have been discussed, and I wish to add a few details which may interest those who have followed the discussion. These particulars I found some time ago among the papers belonging to the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, London, which are at present here in the University Library, and will, I hope, be published shortly in the third volume of the archives of the Church which I am now preparing for the Consistory.

On Monday, July 7, 1662, Evan Tyler writes (from London) to Caesar Calandrin (one of the ministers of the London Dutch Church):

"Monsieur, Ayant esté a ce matin chez * Mr. le Chevalier Brown [Sir Richard Browne; see the Dictionary of National Biography, vol. vii.]. Secrétaire du Conseil par son ordre, il m'a fait savoir que pour le bien des Eglises de Lithuanie, il avoit esté trouvé apropos que ce qu'il y a d'imprimé de leur bible fust mis en deposit entre les mains des Pasteurs et Anciens de vostre Eglise; et que vous fussiez pries de recevoir les dits imprimés en quelque endroit de vostre Bibliothèque pour y estre gardés jusques à ce que les Seigneurs du Conseil qui sont nommés Commissaires pour les Eglises de Lithuanie, en ordonnent pour le bien des dites Eglises. Je ne vous dirai rien pour vous porter a consentir a ce que l'on desire de vostre Compagnie ne doutant point que vous ne vous y portiez de vous meême. Il faudra donner à l'imprimeur un reçu de ce qu'il aura delivré. Si la chose se peut faire des aujourd'hui ce sera le mieux. C'est pourquoy je vous supplie que l'on n'y apporte point de delay. Je suis Monsieur Vostre tres humble et tresobeissant serviteur

"E. Tyrel. Ce 7 Juillet."

The letter is addressed: "To the Reverend Mr. Calandrin, one of the Ministers of the Dutch Church, these London."

On one side of the letter Mr. Calandrin has written (in Dutch):

"July 10, 1662, I gave a receipt to Evan Tylor, printer, for 2980 copies of twenty-six sheets each, the beginning of the Lithuanian Bible, by order of the Commissaries of the High Council for the Lithuanian Collection, to remain in our keeping—namely, of the ministers and elders of the Dutch Church—at the disposal of the said Commissaries."

On the other side he wrote:

"October 7, 1662, I gave a receipt to Tho. Seward for 158 reams of paper for the Lithuanian Bible by appointment of the Commissaries for the Lithuanian Collection for their further order."

* I follow everywhere the spelling of the original.

On Thursday, September 15, 1681, the following order was issued from Whitehall:

"These are to certify whom it may concerne,* That Nicolaus Minwid Superattendens Transvillensis in the Great Dukedome of Lithuania is a Person very particularly and earnestly recommended to his Majesties Royall Protection and Bounty by Letters Recommendatory from their Electorall Highnesses the Prince Elector Palatine, and the Elector of Brandenburg, and that a Petition presented to his Majesty by the said Superattendant is by his Majesties speciall command Recommended to his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord Bishop of London to consider of meanes whereby those distressed Protestant Churches that the said Superattendant doth Petition for, may have some relief suitable to his Majesties gracious Disposition and Royall Goodness in that behalf; Therefore 'tis my opinion that if there be any money or effects in the hands of the Elders of the Dutch Church, or of any other person formerly Collected or given to the Protestant Churches of Lithuania that it may and ought to be paid or delivered to the said Superattendant to the use of the said Churches, Provided his Grace the Lord Archbishop and the Lord Bishop of London be first acquainted therewith and their approbation had thereto. Whitehall, the 15th day of September, 1681.—L. JENNINGS."

Then follows, evidently in the handwriting of the Archbishop of Canterbury, William Sancroft:

"We do approve that the Money, which arose upon the Sale of the paper formerly provided for printing of the Lithuanian Bible, or so much of it as remains in the Hands of the Elders of the Dutch Church in London be paid into the Hands of the Reverend Nicholas Minwid, Superattendant of the Lithuanian Church. Sept. 19th, 1681.

[Signed:] W: Cant.

H: London. [Henry Compton.]"

On the verso is found the following receipt of Nicolaus Minwid:

"Quod a Consistorio Ecclesiae Londino Belgicae Biblia Lituanica Idiomate ex parte Impressa mihi concessa et insuper triginta septeni (sic) librae et sedecim solidi monetae Anglicanae quas chartae venditae produxerunt per manus Reverendi Domini Philippi de Beeck eiusdem Ecclesiae Clerici Ministri numeratae et a me receptae fuerint, hac manus meae Subscriptione testor, atque grato animo fateor Scriptum Londini Anno 1681, 20 Septembris, Nicolaus Minwid Superattendens Districtus Transvillensis mpp."

From this receipt it appears, therefore, that Minwid received from the Dutch Church the copies of the Lithuanian Bible as far as it had been printed, besides £37 16s., the produce of the paper, which had all been entrusted to the Church on July 10 and October 7, 1662, according to Calendrin's receipts printed above. On looking in the Consistorial Acta Book of the time, which I have also here, I find the following note (in Dutch) under date October 5, 1681:

"As a certain student from Poland had undertaken to translate the Bible into the Lithuanian language, and some copies, as far as he had been able to complete it in his lifetime, together with some papers ordered for the printing of it, had been placed in our library with the consent of the late Mr. Oalandryn, and the papers, to prevent their being damaged, were sold to Mr. Jan Lande (?), stationer, on September 20, 1672, for £37 17s., and as Mr. Nicolaus Minwid, Superintendent of some Reformed Churches in Lithuania, at the order and instruction of the Synod of these churches, has requested us for leave to take away these copies of this Bible so commenced, together with the money realised by the paper sold—the Brethren of the Consistory having seen his instructions, and an approbation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and Mr. Leonyn Inkins, Secretary of State, consented to his taking away these copies of the Bible and would hand him the money aforesaid, which was done according to his receipt dated September 20, 1681."

* I follow again the original.

I do not think that researches in the Acta Books would yield further information, but the above seems sufficient to explain the whereabouts of the Bible and the paper from 1662 to 1681. It is not impossible that one or two copies of the book may have remained in the church, which I myself have searched four or five times, but merely for MSS., letters, and documents. Printed sheets or books may therefore have escaped me.

ARNOBIVS AND THE "GOSPEL OF PETER."

Jersey: Feb. 8, 1896.

Two years ago I pointed out (Athenaeum, May 13, 1893) that the Gospel of Peter was largely used in the Institutes of Lactantius and the Acta Pilati. Those two works, taken together, provide certain important additions to the Akhmim fragment. My object in the present letter is to show that further additions are supplied by comparing the Acta and the Institutes with a third authority—the Adversus Gentes of Arnobius.

Let us consider the personality of Arnobius. (1) He was a Docetist. He speaks of our Lord as "disguising" Himself in the garb of the human race, "feigning" Himself a man in order to deceive the powers of darkness. He tells us that it was not Christ that was slain, "but only a very small part of Him." "the form which He bore about with Him." (2) Arnobius was the master of Lactantius; and the obligation of Lactantius to the Gospel of Peter is unquestionable.

A priori, then, there is considerable likelihood that it was the Gospel of Peter which supplied Arnobius with his extra-canonical matter; and this likelihood is slightly increased when we compare his statement (Adv. Gentes, i. 63) that Christ when crucified "regarded but as childish trifles the wrongs done to Him" with pseudo-Peter's "He was silent as though He felt no pain." But it is not a matter for mere guessing. The coincidences of Arnobius with the extra-canonical matter in Lactantius and the Acta Pilati leave very little room for doubt that all three were indebted to one and the same document.

(I.) "Christ made the lame to run" (Adv. Gentes, i. 45). So in the Institutes (iv. 15): "To the lame and those afflicted with some defect of the feet He not only gave the power of walking, but also of running." In the Report of Pilate we are twice told that "He gave the power to walk and run." (Cf. Justin, Adv. Trypho., 69: "Those lame from birth He enabled to leap by a word.")

(II.) It is not merely the phrase "to run" that is common to Arnobius, Lactantius, and the Acta, but also the fact itself that Christ signally healed one who was lame. In addition to the passages above quoted, we find "He gave the power of walking to the shrivelled," "corrected the shrivelling of the sinews" (Adv. Gentes, i. 47, 48). In the Institutes (iv. 28), "He renewed the feet of the lame." And in the Acta Pilati (I. Latin and Greek A.) we are told that He performed this miracle on the Sabbath.

(III.) Arnobius tells us that "Christ loosed the rigidity of joints"; "He healed deformity"; "joints relaxed the rigidity acquired even at birth" (Adv. Gentes, i. 45, 47, 48). The allusion here points to a hunchback. Similarly in the Acta Pilati we are told that Christ healed one who was κνυρὸς (gibberosus) on the Sabbath (I. Greek A. and Latin); and the man gives evidence before Pilate, "I was κνυρὸς, and seeing Him I cried, 'Have mercy on me, Lord,' and he made me straight with a word." By the way, the statement in the Report of Pilate that the man with the withered hand was wonderfully deformed, and had not half his body sound, leaves room for a suspicion that he and the hunchback may be one and the same.

(IV.) Arnobius tells us that on one occasion Christ "healed a hundred or more afflicted with various diseases and infirmities by a single act of intervention" (i. 46). Here we are reminded of Matt. xv. 30, 31; but, in the light of what has gone before, it seems unlikely that the statement is a mere rhetorical embellishment on the part of Arnobius. And there is a suggestive coincidence in the Institutes (iv. 15), "By a single word, in a single moment, He healed the sick and infirm and those afflicted with every kind of disease."

(V.) Arnobius calls Christ "the gate of life" (Adv. Gentes, ii. 65). So does Lactantius (Institutes iv. 29). (Cf. "I am the gate of life," Clem. Hom. iii. 52.)

Things being so, we may with some confidence add to the Gospel of Peter the cure of a lame man who was told to rise and run, and of a man born hunchbacked, both on the Sabbath; also the simultaneous cure of a great crowd. And there is a remaining extra-canonical reference in Adv. Gentes, i. 50, "ulcers oris immensi et recusantia perpeti frenavit" (a detail of the leper's cure?), which probably belongs to the same source.

But the matter does not end here. With the light afforded by the extra-canonical references of Arnobius, and bearing in mind the facts mentioned in the Athenaeum article above referred to, we may recover further fragments of the Gospel of Peter from the Acta and the Institutes—fragments of the highest interest.

(a.) In the Acta:

"I lay sick upon my bed thirty-eight years. And some young men had pity on me and carried me with my bed and took me to Him. And He said, 'Arise, take up thy bed and depart to thine house' . . . on the Sabbath."

"I was born blind. And as Jesus passed by I cried with a loud voice, 'Have mercy on me, Thou Son of David.' And He laid His hands upon my eyes (v.r., took clay and anointed my eyes)."

Notice here the daring identification of the paralytic of Capernaum and blind man of Jericho with St. John's paralytic of Bethesda and blind man of Siloam.

(b.) In the Institutes, iv. 15:

"A multitude followed of maimed and sick. And He went up into a mountain, and when he had tarried there three days, . . . five loaves and two fishes in a wallet."

"They began to be distressed by a contrary wind. And when they were in the midst of the sea, He came up to them walking as though on the ground. And, again, when He had gone to sleep and the wind had begun to rage, being aroused from sleep, He ordered the wind to be silent."

Notice that here Lactantius mixes the feeding of the 5000 with the feeding of the 4000, and the storm stilling of Matt. viii. 23-27; Mk. iv. 35 with the storm stilling of Matt. xiv. 32, 33; Mk. vi. 51, 52. Most critics regard these doublets in our canonical Gospels as evidence of the combination of separate documents; and the fact that pseudo-Peter should identify narratives between which our canonical Evangelists have distinguished points perhaps to his having had access to the documents behind.

* In Adv. Gentes, i. 53, we find a reference which the Akhmim fragment does not support—"an earthquake shook the world, the sea was heaved up from its depths, the heaven was shrouded in darkness, the sun's fiery blaze was checked and his heat became moderate." But that all four elements were affected is a stock argument, frequently repeated in early Christian literature; and a comparison of the passages in which it occurs obviously points us back not to any gospel but to some work argumentative and rhetorical.

Thus, in fine, the miraculous narratives which we are justified in imputing to the Gospel of Peter point in exactly the same direction as the Akhmim fragment. Pseudo-Peter makes use of the Fourth Gospel, but in such a free manner as to prove that it was very new when he wrote. His miracles show development as contrasted with the Synoptic; but the doubling back, above noted, of the Synoptic Gospels into themselves tends to show that the posteriority is not absolute.

F. P. BADHAM.

THE VERB "DEECH."

Oxford: Feb. 17, 1896.

I have to thank Prof. Napier for courteously pointing out that Prof. J. Bugge had already dealt with O.E. dēcan, and its cognates outside Teutonic: which I should have been glad to know in 1894. There is, I think, something to be said for the sense "impregnate"; for the modern ditched (which has now been also reported to me as deech't), has not merely the sense "smeared," but especially that of ingrained with dirt, which has, as it were, dried into the surface.

I am grieved that my remarks on the interesting history of the word have disturbed my old friend Dr. Henry Sweet, and moved him to a letter somewhat wanting in the suavity which one would fain associate with his name. I grieve the more because it obliges me to undertake the time-wasting task of correcting him as to the substance of his statements. The picture which he has drawn of myself coming to him "in great perplexity," to learn "how it was possible to connect the O.E. deccan with German decken" (!!!), and of my amiable mentor, in compassion of my forgetfulness of elementary facts of Teutonic phonology, opening his own MS. dictionary, and imparting to me precious knowledge "known only to a specialist like [him]self," is very pretty, and might form the subject of an interesting painting "of us twain."

But, alas! it is too ideal. I came to O.E. dēcan in another and more matter-of-fact way. The quotations for deche from the fifteenth-century Palladius came before me in January, 1874, in ordinary course, among the dictionary slips, and the word had to be dealt with as to sense and etymology. Looking, in ordinary course, to see if there was any corresponding word in O.E. (Anglo-Saxon), I duly found in Bosworth deccan and its cross-reference to gedeccan, with "the three well-known instances" quoted, and saw (as anyone would have seen in the circumstances) that the sense was the same as that of deech, and the form given a mistake for dēcan. It did not occur to me that this was any particular discovery, or that I or anyone else had any property in dēcan. But I was interested in the fact that a word found in O.E. should not (so far as I could see) appear again till the fifteenth century; for it strengthened the feeling one had often had, that many words known to us first in fifteenth-century vocabularies must have existed in English from the beginning, though no example of them has come down to us; and during the ensuing two months, while deech was passing from "copy" to "final," I mentioned the circumstance incidentally to various English scholars who are in the habit of asking if I have any interesting words in hand. Among these were Mr. M. H. Liddell, who was working at a new edition of Palladius, and had often examined passages for us, Prof. J. Wright, Mr. Mayhew, and possibly Prof. Skeat and Prof. Sievers; that I did not mention it to Prof. Napier, and thereby learn from him that the O.E. word had been already discussed by Prof.

Bugge, must be owing to the circumstance that I did not happen to meet him. It is very probable that I mentioned it also to Dr. Sweet, although I do not remember this. It is possible even that I asked him if he had Thorpe's Homilies at hand, and could verify for me Bosworth's quotation (not quotations, as Dr. Sweet puts it; there is only one, the quotations are in the Leechdoms, which I verified myself). We do regularly verify quotations from other dictionaries. Prof. Napier has collated passages for us a score of times: so has Prof. Skeat, Dr. Aldis Wright, Mr. Macaulay, and many others. Dr. Sweet has similarly obliged us more than once. I, in my turn, have furnished other scholars with hundreds of quotations or collations, as, if there were any need for it, fifty readers of the ACADEMY could attest. That on such an occasion I may have referred to the absurd dictionary identification of the O.E. verb with German decken is quite possible, and that Dr. Sweet may have looked up his MS. dictionary to see if he had got it right is also possible; but that he was under the impression that he had communicated to me some special information on the word I never knew till Saturday last. As a fact, my original letter to the ACADEMY was not sent when written, being kept back, in the first place, until I could get the quotation from the Homilies verified, and eventually it was lost sight of and, as other words pressed upon me, forgotten. I turned it out of the pocket of an old coat a short while ago when its original occasion had long passed; but as ditch had meanwhile turned up, and by its apparent identity with M.E. deche, added fresh interest to the history of the word, I sent the original letter, as it was written in 1894, with an epilogue referring to the modern dialect word, little dreaming that I should thereby disturb the gentle soul of my friend Dr. Sweet, of all men. But we live in perilous times: now it is an American President, now a German Kaiser, now an Old English "specialist," who, as with a bolt from the blue, warns us in vigorous language that neither in Venezuela, nor in South Africa, nor in the ACADEMY must we, under penalty of his high displeasure, venture on territory within his "sphere of influence."

As to the characteristic words about "decking oneself with borrowed philological plumes," I will not rejoin with "Physician, heal thyself!" on the ground that Dr. Sweet claims as his special property in 1894 what Prof. Napier shows had been published by Prof. Bugge eight years before. Dr. Sweet is an honourable man, and evidently knew no more about Prof. Bugge's article than I did. I am sure he has as little need of "borrowed philological plumes" as I have. As to my own habits in the acknowledgment of borrowings, I think I can safely leave myself in the hands of English and foreign scholars; they will appreciate the humour of the situation.

One word in conclusion. Dr. Sweet in the preface to his Oldest English Texts in 1886, disgusted by the want of appreciation urbis et orbis—of Oxford and the world—announced his withdrawal, "for a time, at least," from the ungrateful field of English philology. The friends who like myself regretted this withdrawal, and the manner of it, and all who are more anxious to see work done than to squabble over who does it, will be glad to see that Achilles has again emerged from his tent, eager for the fray; and even if he at first hit out rather wildly, Berserker-like belabouring friend and foe, and damaging himself not a little, they will hope that, when this "humorous" fit has passed, he will again fall into line and do useful service in some department of English scholarship.

J. A. H. MURRAY.

Oxford: Feb. 24, 1896.

In my forthcoming edition of the M.E. Palladius I had expected to note Prof. Bugge's correction of the error in Bosworth-Toller in respect to O.E. dēcan, to which Prof. Napier called my attention some two years ago, and present also the evidence furnished by the M.E. and N.E. forms as communicated to the ACADEMY two weeks since by Dr. Murray. But as the word seems, to have aroused some interest, it might be well to mention a N.E. dialect form which is regular and does not present the difficult shortening we have in ditch. In A General Dictionary of Provincialisms, ed. Wm. Holloway (Sussex Press, 1838), deched is entered on p. 41 as an adjective meaning foul, with the illustration, "The scythe is so deched I can't sharpen it" (Warwickshire). Wright also has the word in his Provincial Glossary, and assigns to it the meaning of "foul," "rusty," improving somewhat on the previous editor.

If this spelling represents a long close i-sound as in "green," we have here the regular representative of O.E. dēcan. In the North of England and in the Lowlands of Scotland we ought to get forms with k, such as deek; but I can find no trace of this, unless it is in the daik entered in Jamieson as being in use in Ayrshire, with two senses: (a) "to daik the head"—i.e., "smooth the hair," (b) "to soak, to moisten." (The second instance cited by Dr. Murray from the M.E. Palladius seems to have this meaning.) Also Jamieson says that in Ayrshire the expression, "It has ne'er been daikit," describes a thing that "has never been used or is quite new." In Jamieson's Dictionary ai represents an ā-sound.

According to Ellis (Early Eng. Pron., vol. v., p. 723), an ā-sound as the representative of M.E. ā is regular in Dialect 33—that is, the South-East of Scotland; so far as one can make out from the scanty material, the South-West and Ayrshire should have an i-sound in N.E. green. But even if the form is dēk as Jamieson represents, we have no greater anomaly than occurs in N.E. steak. So that it may be possible to connect daik also with O.E. dēcan.

MARK H. LIDDELL.

Liverpool: Feb. 21, 1896.

This verb is extant, as Dr. Murray surmises, in a modern English dialect; I have been familiar with it from childhood, but in the speech of one person only—my mother. On reading Dr. Murray's letter in the ACADEMY for February 15, I at once asked her what was the meaning of the word "deech," and she replied:

"Oh, it's a Birmingham word, which I have never heard in Liverpool. My mother used to apply it to clothes that were not clean—that were of a bad complexion with bad washing, not merely soiled with wear or use. Things that looked deechy."

I remember thinking that the word was probably connected (antithetically) with "bleach" and imagined it written "deach."

THE SIN-EATER IN WALES.

New College, Eastbourne: Feb. 22, 1896.

Now that Mr. Owen has retired from the field to all appearance, you will perhaps allow me, as the person who was directly challenged by Mr. Hartland, and the initiator of the whole discussion, to say a word or two on the question.

The main purpose of my letter in the Times was to throw doubt on the Llandebie story, and my doubts rest on a point that has not yet been mentioned in the ACADEMY. In the evidence quoted by Canon Silvan Evans in the ACADEMY in 1878, the schoolmaster of Llandebie stated that cakes were not given at Llandebie. If this is so, it seems to me impossible to suppose that the Sin-eater existed there at the close of the first half of the century, if Mr. Hartland is correct in regarding this dolo as a survival and degenerate form of the central rite was in full tide if those portions of the ritual which survive longest in other parts had entirely disappeared.

My second point is, that if Mr. Hartland is correct in identifying all these funeral customs with tribal feasts, he cannot adduce them all as proofs of the existence of the Sin-eater, unless he is prepared to argue that in Wales and the Borders the whole of the tribal ceremonial was swallowed up in the Sin-eating. Unless the custom of tribal feasts underwent a uniform evolution, we should find by the side of any single descendant of it in folk-custom various analogous customs bearing a resemblance more or less close; but these analogous customs cannot be brought forward as a proof of the existence of their co-descendants. We are not entitled to conclude the general practice of Sin-eating from an analogical argument, backed by a few isolated instances on the authority of a single writer, who wrote forty years after the single case which he mentions within the Welsh borders. I say a single writer advisedly, for I cannot regard Mr. Moggridge as an authority: he gives us no hint of his source: we have no certainty that he derived his account at first hand or even at second. I am not enamoured of the anonymous newspaper correspondent as a collector of folk-lore; but he is better off than Mr. Moggridge's informant, for, if he cannot be identified, he is at least not liable to have his words distorted by transmission and final publication at third, fourth, or fifth hand. Even if we had no denials such as those given by intelligent and competent persons like Mr. Rowlands in 1871, the Llandebie story would rest on an uncertain foundation. In the face of these denials, it seems impossible to give credence to it.

I call attention to the fact that in 1878, though the Sin-eater was said to have existed thirty years previously, no one was produced who had ever seen him, nor even one who had seen a person who had seen him. Thirty years is not so long in a rural district that old customs are forgotten. If the Sin-eater had really existed there in 1850, it would have been possible to find an eye-witness. But no eye-witness was forthcoming.

SCIENCE.

ZOOLOGICAL NOMENCLATURE.

AT the meeting of the Zoological Society, to be held on Tuesday next, Mr. P. L. Solater, the secretary, will introduce a discussion on Zoological Nomenclature, with some remarks on the divergencies between the rules for the scientific naming of animals, compiled by the German Zoological Society, and the Stricklandian code of nomenclature. The following is the text of the German rules:

"A.—GENERAL RULES.

1. Zoological nomenclature includes extinct as well as recent animals, but has no relation to botanical names.
2. Only such scientific names can be accepted as are published in print, in connexion with a clear description either by words or figures.
3. Scientific names must be in Latin.
4. Names of the same origin and only differing from each other in the way they are written are to be considered identical.
5. Alterations in names otherwise valid are only permitted in accordance with the requirements of sections 13 and 22, and further for the purpose of purely orthographical correction when the word is without doubt wrongly written or incorrectly transcribed. Such alterations do not affect the authorship of the name.
6. Of the various permissible names for the same conception only the one first published is valid (Law of Priority).
7. The application of the Law of Priority begins with the tenth edition of Linneus's Systema Naturae (1758).
8. When by subsequent authors a systematic conception is extended or reduced, the original name is nevertheless to be regarded as permissible.
9. The author of a scientific name is he who has first proposed it in a permissible form. If the author's name is not known, the title of the publication must take its place.
10. If the name of the author is given, it should follow the scientific name without intervening sign. In all cases in which a second author's name is used, a comma should be placed before it.

"11. Class (classis), Order (ordo), Family (familia), Genus (genus), and Species (species) are conceptions descending in rank one after the other, and are to be taken in the order here given. These terms should not be employed in a contrary or capricious relation or order.

"B.—RULES FOR DESIGNATING SPECIES.

12. Every species should be designated by one generic and one specific name (Binary Nomenclature).
13. The specific name, which should be treated always as one word, should depend grammatically upon the generic name.
14. The same specific name can only be used once in the same genus.
15. In the case of a species being subdivided, the original name is to be retained for the species which contains the form originally described. In doubtful cases the decision of the author who makes the separation shall be followed.
16. When various names are proposed for the same species nearly at the same date, so that the priority cannot be ascertained, the decision of the first author that points out the synonymy should be followed.
17. In the case of species with a cycle of generation of different forms, the specific term must be taken from an adult form capable of reproduction. In these cases, as also in species in which polymorphy occurs, the Law of Priority must be observed.
18. The author of the specific name is the author of the species.
19. The author's name should be placed in brackets when the original generic name is replaced by another.
20. Hybrids should be designated either by a horizontal cross between the parents' names, or by these names being placed one above the other with a line between. The parents' sexes should be stated, when known. The name of the describer of the hybrid should be added, preceded by a comma.

"C.—RULES FOR THE NAMES OF SUBSPECIES AND OTHER DIVERGENCES FROM TYPICAL SPECIES OR SUBSPECIES.

"21. When constant local forms, varieties, strains, &c., require special names, these names should be placed after the specific name. The rules for such names are the same as those for specific names.

"D.—RULES FOR GENERIC NAMES.

22. Names of genera should be substantives, and of the singular number. They should be one word, and be written with a large initial letter. If a subgenus is used, its name (which follows the same rules as a generic name) should be given in brackets after the generic name.
23. A generic name is only valid when a known or a sufficiently characterised species (or several species) is referred to it, or when a sufficient diagnosis of it is given.
24. The same generic name can only be employed once in zoology. Nor can names already proposed as subgeneric be employed also as generic names in another sense.
25. When several generic names are proposed for a genus at nearly the same date, so that their priority cannot be settled, the name for which a type-species is given is to be preferred. In all uncertain cases the decision of the author who first arranges the synonymy is to be followed.
26. When a genus is separated into several genera, the old name must be retained for the type-species. If this cannot be positively ascertained, the author who splits up the genus must select one of the species originally in the genus as the type. When a subgenus is raised to generic rank, the subgeneric name becomes the generic name.

"E.—RULES FOR THE NAMES OF THE HIGHER SYSTEMATIC GROUPS.

27. Names for higher systematic groups of animals must have a plural termination.
28. Names of families and subfamilies must henceforth be taken from the name of one of the genera belonging to the group, and formed from the stem of that name, with the addition of -idae (plural of -ides [Gr. -ειδης], masc.) for the families and -inae (fem.) for the subfamilies.

The principal points in which these rules conflict with the Stricklandian code are three in number, namely:

1. The German rules (sect. 1) disclaim any relation to botany, so that, according to them, the same generic names may be used in zoology and botany. This is contrary to the Stricklandian code (sect. 10).

2. Under sect. 5 of the German rules the same term is to be used for the generic and specific name of a species, if these names have priority. This is contrary to the Stricklandian code (sect. 13).

3. The German rules (sect. 7) adopt the 10th edition of the Systema Naturae (1758) as the starting-point of zoological nomenclature, whereas the Stricklandian code (sect. 2) adopts the 12th (1766).—P. L. S.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE RESTORED PRONUNCIATION OF GREEK."

Liverpool: Jan. 20, 1896.

In addition to the comments already offered (ACADEMY, January 11), the proposals of the Welsh professors need criticism also in respect to accentuation. They say that "we should certainly make our pronunciation more, not less, remote from that of the Greeks themselves, if we gave to their accented syllables the same stress as we do to the accented syllables in English"; and that

"perhaps the most practical reform would be to pronounce Greek words with an even degree of stress on all syllables."

Both of these propositions I venture to deny. It is indisputable that the ancient accents were musical, and signified acute tone, grave tone, and the succession of acute and grave respectively, in the notation which has been handed down to us. Must we continue to ignore that notation? Attempts have been made to show that ancient Greek possessed a stress accent which did not necessarily fall upon the same syllable as the tonic accent. But while this may be admitted to be theoretically possible, it is noteworthy that the two investigators who have tried to locate this stress have arrived at quite discordant conclusions; and the fact remains that the old tonic accent was gradually transformed into a stress accent, which is found to-day on exactly the same syllables where the tonic accent formerly fell, while the supposed independent ancient stress accent has vanished into thin air. The safest conclusions seem to be: (1) that the syllables of a Greek word were uttered each distinctly, but not with perfectly even stress; (2) that a slight stress tended to accompany the tonic accent. I say "tended to accompany," because it would doubtless happen in such a case, as it actually does in French, that the rhetorical or sentence stress would often overmaster the weak accentuation of the words and occasionally reverse it. I should therefore advocate the observance of the Greek acute and circumflex accents in the first instance as stress. If the student is compelled at the same time to bring out the vowel quality of every syllable distinctly, that in itself will modify the native violence of English stress. He must also be restrained from lengthening the stressed vowels of open syllables, if short. At some later stage he might be taught to give to these stressed syllables a raised musical pitch. This is not such a difficult thing as it may seem. It is commonly assumed that in English the musical pitch of discourse is purely rhetorical and has absolutely nothing to do with word-accent. But this is not strictly true. If the intonation of any long sentence be noted down, it will be found that all the chief word-accent falls upon maxima or minima of pitch. We always, except in purposed monotone, give musical distinction to the accented syllable; and in Greek we need only learn to make this distinction always by raising and never by lowering the tone. Whether it would be worth while to restore the compound rising and falling tone to the circumflex, may be doubted; but it would be a real gain to have the accents observed, even as weak stress. I differ from the Welsh professors in thinking that we should then be many steps nearer to, not further from, the true ancient language. It would at any rate be much less horrible to hear Greek pronounced thus, than to hear intelligent men reading out the masterpieces of human speech in monotone and without accent, with something less than the charm of a curate saying prayers or of a National school declaiming the Catechism. One would like to hear a play of Aristophanes "restored" on the stage in this manner and then to kill the stage-manager.

The sounds of the Greek language, including breathings and diphthongs, are about forty. About half of these need no reformation; about half of the remainder can be restored with some certainty; but there are about a dozen sounds as to which the most instructed opinion is divided, either as to the facts or as to the appropriate measure of reform. In saying this I do not class as instructed opinion that of those who would impose modern, or relatively modern, Greek pronunciations upon us wholesale. Let us both work back from the more modern pronunciations and forward from those of Aryan and post-Aryan antiquity; let us weigh the various spellings of the monuments, and the transcriptions of Greek words into the Latin alphabet and into the Kypriot syllabary—even then it will appear that there is much room for difference of opinion as to classical pronunciation, a difference which can be only reduced by further study and exploration of the original sources. This will appear clearly when the evidence respecting each several symbol is gone into. So far are we still from being able, as alleged, "to reproduce with certainty the sounds actually heard at Athens in the fifth century B.C."

It is very remarkable that the evidence for the critical period 500-300 B.C. is perhaps more slippery than that for any other age. It would be palpably easier to determine the pronunciation of Constantinople in A.D. 1000, or of Alexandria in A.D. 100, or even that of Homer, than that of Athens in the period of its greatness. I strongly suspect that that period was one of transition in pronunciation as well as in other things. Pronunciation is always tending to change more or less; but the historical study of phonetics has revealed immense differences in the pace of change. The causes of these differences are difficult to trace; but it seems to be established that a great and busy city, uncontrolled by the linguistic inertia of a country population, or of other cities speaking the same language, will change its pronunciation at an abnormally rapid rate. There was ample time in six generations of human lives for much to happen in the way of phonetic change, and that without attracting much, if any, attention from those immediately concerned.

The preceding part of this letter was already in type when the reply of Profs. Conway and Arnold to my former letter appeared in the ACADEMY of February 15. I rejoice to learn that there is some prospect of a reissue of their pamphlet, in which full attention will be given to criticisms received. No one would be more disappointed than I if they desisted from working towards this reform. They complain of the "exaggerated" nature of my attack; but the whole scheme was put forward with such an air of practical finality that the necessity of forcible remonstrance was self-evident. I understand that it has actually begun to be put in force in the colleges. This seems to me to be quite premature. My chief points against the pamphlet are: (1) that there are several errors in the "phonetic explanations"; (2) that authoritative decisions are given respecting pronunciations which are really still sub judice. The errors in phonetics are admitted; and the question whether I rightly called them "serious" need not detain us. They were certainly avoidable. As to the other branch of the accusation, I fear that space compels postponement to a further letter, in which I shall not forget to meet the professors' challenge respecting ε and η.

A CONJECTURE IN OVID'S HEROIDES, IX. 93.

St. Paul's School: Feb. 22, 1896.

"Quaeque redundabat fecundo vulnere serpens Fertilis, et damnis dives ab ipsa suis."

It is most rash to attempt to improve on any suggestion made by Prof. Palmer, but (whether I have been anticipated or no, I cannot say) I cannot help thinking that "repullabat" would approach more nearly to P's apparent reading, "redulabat," and at the same time make even better sense than "rebellabat."

"Pullo" is used by Calpurnius; and, though "repullo" does not occur, "repullulasco," "repullulesco," and "repullulo" are given in the dictionaries.

An extremely parallel passage is quoted by Faeciolati (s.v. "pullulasco") from Prudentius (Prudent. in Romano, περὶ σκεφ. ult. v. 882), who asks, referring to the Hydra:

"Utrum renatis pullulescat artubus."

The re of "renatis," plus the "pullulescat," almost suggests a reminiscence; and the next line, "Ac se imminuti corporis damnis novum Instaurat," can hardly owe its similarity to accident.

Virgil's (Aen. vii. 329) "Tam saevae facies, tot pullulat atra colubris," which is also quoted by Faeciolati, is hardly less to the point.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CLIFTON SHAKESPEARE SOCIETY.—[Saturday,
January 25.]

ARTHUR S. WAY, Esq., president, in the chair.—In a paper on "The Genesis of the 'Merry Wives of Windsor,'" Mr. Way said, in reference to the tradition, that Elizabeth bespoke from Shakspeare a drama of "Falstaff in Love," that we cannot expect to find documentary evidence among state papers or records of the Lord Chamberlain. But the pedigree, so to call it, of the tradition is as good as that of most items of personal interest about distinguished men. The farthest link in the story is the actor Betterton, who was born in 1635, less than twenty years after Shakspeare's death, and who therefore might have heard it from the poet's contemporaries. Rowe, in his Life of Shakspeare, published in 1709, quotes it on Betterton's authority. Dennis had previously given it, presumably from the same source, in 1702, in the preface to "The Comical Gallant," a comedy founded on the "Merry Wives of Windsor." Gildon, who was Betterton's friend and biographer, repeated it in 1710; and Pope, Theobald, and other early editors accepted it without question. Moreover, there is nothing antecedently improbable in the story. Shakspeare, like other playwrights of his time, must often have written to order; and there would be for a dramatist in those days (bearing in mind the social and we may say the statutory position of the class) something very flattering, something inspiring, in the command of a queen to write a comedy for her delectation. We know also that the Queen, who believed herself to have a very pretty literary taste, and who could talk Euphuism with the best of her courtiers, was not chary of suggestion on occasion. Hartley Coleridge's view—"that Queen Bess should have desired to see Falstaff making love proves her to have been, as she was, a gross-minded old baggage"—is by no means an inevitable inference. We are not compelled to suppose that she indicated to the alighest extent the course of treatment of the theme, or that she wanted to see what figure Falstaff would cut as a courtier engaged in a too common occupation of the courtiers of the day. That Elizabeth did not see the impossibility of making Falstaff really in love, is only to say that she had not the artistic literary sense, which proposition is expressed with unnecessary brutality by Dowden when he says: "The Merry Wives of Windsor is a play written expressly for the 'barbarian' aristocracy, with their hatred of ideas, their insensibility to beauty, their hard efficient manners, and their demand for impropriety"—a description which might better apply to the aristocracy of the days of the Georges than to the bright wits who surrounded Elizabeth. Shakspeare can hardly have so regarded them when he made Prince Hal so nearly a match for Falstaff in some of their wit-combats. There is also nothing improbable in that feature of the legend which defines the time of the play's composition as fourteen days. The first cast of the comedy, as printed in the first Quarto, was only 1410 lines. We do not find our present version of over 3000 lines till the Folio of 1623. That Shakspeare could not have composed at the average rate of 100 lines per day is preposterous. The real difficulty of producing such a play at short notice lay not so much in the mere amount of work involved, as in the new conception, which the poet saw to be inevitable, of a character which had already taken a certain shape in his mind. He found himself under the necessity of recasting his Falstaff. He could not, and would not do this so as to make an impossible Falstaff—since he must call this new creation "Falstaff." But he did, in order to make him possible, divest him of much of his wit, of his ready presence of mind, of his incomparable art of simultaneously warding and returning the shrewdest thrusts of an antagonist. The old wit, indeed, scintillates here and there, and the old humour flashes out in a situation which is the severest test of a man's sense of humour—when the laugh is against himself, as in his account to Ford of the buck-basket episode. There was enough of Falstaff left to pass muster; and the make-up and acting of the actor would do the rest. Dowden, as usual, a little overstates the case when he puts it thus: "He dressed up a fat rogue brought forward for the occasion, from the back premises of the poet's imagination, in Falstaff's clothes; he allowed persons and places and times to jumble themselves up as they pleased; he made it impossible for the most barbarous nineteenth century critic to patch on the 'Merry Wives' to 'King Henry IV.' But the Queen and her court laughed as the buck-basket was emptied into the ditch, no more suspecting that its gross lading was not the incomparable jester of Eastcheap than Ford suspected the woman with a great beard to be other than the veritable Dame Pratt." Now this view really makes the problem as to the position in Falstaff's life of the events of the play absolutely unimportant. No doubt, if we must find a place for the "Merry Wives of Windsor" in a connected and consistent biography of Sir John Verplanck's hypothesis (Illustrated Shakspeare, 1847), quoted by Rolfe in his edition of the play, that it must come before the Histories is the correct one. But it is noteworthy that Shakspeare does not, by any single allusion (unless we accept the very vague and general one in IV. v. 83-88), connect Falstaff with the life and surroundings of the Henrys. He, with his hangers-on, is lifted bodily up and transported like a Sinbad to an enchanted valley. But Prince Hal, Poins, the Chief Justice, the wars, Falstaff's military reputation, are as though they had never been. It is as if the poet had meant to say, "This is Falstaff—for those to whom he is Falstaff." Yet, even so, not quite all has been said. There may be a subtle holding up to nature in this new presentation of Falstaff in new surroundings. It is no uncommon thing to find that a man who has a reputation as a wit or as a brilliant talker in congenial society becomes, when dropped among dull, commonplace, matter-of-fact people, tongue-tied. He seems to be paralysed by his surroundings. The steel cannot strike fire on clay. And so when Falstaff came in contact with plain, homespun folk, in whose talk there is nothing provocative to his wit, he is an Antaeus whose feet are for the time lifted off the earth. He needs the bright ring of Prince Hal's tongue, the music of his laugh, the glitter of word-play, to bring out the Falstaff of Eastcheap, the flame round which the princely moth cannot choose but hover.—Miss Katharine G. Blake, in a paper on "Character in the 'Merry Wives of Windsor,'" said that the play is brimful of absurdity. No trace of the sadness or pathos of life shadows its versatility or solemnises its mood. Fun rides rampant throughout with no check to his bridle. For though jealousy raises its head, it is of so groundless a nature and so harmless in its results that it never silences the ripple of laughter which flows around the doings of the "merry wives." If in "Othello" jealousy mounts to its height of tragic terror, here it tricks itself in comic garb and turns our laughter from Falstaff's woes to good Master Ford's. The play has two themes, a major and a minor; with true artistic power, the threads are woven together, and the crisis of the fat knight's discomfiture is the opportunity for the happy loves of "Sweet Anne Page" and her favoured lover. Hopeless scoundrel as Falstaff here appears, his rascality never raises our anger nor stirs our scorn. Is it his unfailing good temper under ridicule and failure which makes us like the old rogue? Good-temper seasoned with wit is so lovable. Then, too, he is a warm-hearted old rascal. We recall his words when Prince Hal had made sport of him: "The rogue hath given me medicine to make me love him." Masters Page and Ford are well distinguished. Page is cheerfully ready to stake all on his wife's honour. Ford's temper is of a decidedly jealous nature; where jealousy is unfounded, it is, perhaps, a sign of weakness of character. Ford's irritable weakness makes us enjoy his discomfiture little less than that of the knight. The scene between Anne Page and Fenton shows that true love is always humble. Slender's muddle-headed condition is well portrayed. Talent is shown in delineating noble character; but genius is needed to invent a fool who shall be true to nature, and who shall not bore but delight us by his folly. This is work such as we find in Miss Austen's writings, and in this power she has been compared to Shakspeare. Compare her Mr. Woodhouse, Mrs. Bennett, Mr. Collins, and Miss Bates; each is the perfection of folly. The first, the hypochondriac taking his walk in the sun, or offering "half a glass of wine" or a "small egg" at supper to a hungry guest; then the shallow, worldly mother with her transparent plans for settling her daughters, and her ridiculous assertion that there is quite as much change in character to observe in the country as in town; Mr. Collins, with pompous folly making the irresistible offer of his hand; and Miss Bates, with her garrulity, her simplicity, her too overflowing gratitude—who does not know and love her!—Mr. Way read a paper written by a member of the Melbourne Shakspeare Society, in which it was said that the plot of the play of the "Merry Wives of Windsor" contains all the stock characters of the erotic writers of the French, Spanish, and Italian schools. But Shakspeare's edition of the fascinating reductive creature of romance is an amorous knight, well stricken in years, sensual in body, swinish in habit, bestial in mind, a greasy, leering old satyr. Shakspeare's women differ no less than the lover from the romantic type. The minor plot of the play depicts a story of pure and honest love. Shakspeare has given us a comedy as interesting and amusing as his Italian models; but he has from the materials extracted good where they found evil, he has treated in an absolutely inoffensive manner the incidents in which they sensuously wallow. Instead of an atmosphere of guilt and suspicion we find refreshing purity of thought, purity of motive, purity of action. A wholesome open-air character pervades the play and carries away, in a few seconds, even the rank odour of the old sinner's greasy lust. Shakspeare, with the uncleanest of models and in a play which, lacking literary merits, might have seemed to require some adventitious bolstering, has almost entirely eschewed coarseness. He makes vice, not virtue, ridiculous; makes sin hideous and the sinner contemptible; there is no pandering to vicious tastes, no glorification of successful villainy, no suggestive tampering with the Seventh Commandment; the lessons inculcated are wholesome, and the tendency of the play is to make us better men, better Christians.—Mr. L. M. Griffiths called attention to the question of incorrect costume so often adopted by actors in Shakspeare's plays, and showed in the Boydell Collection the pictures illustrating the "Merry Wives," which, though admirable examples of the engraver's art, do not in all cases represent the dress of the people in the play, which would be more like that given in the illustrations in the Ellesmere MS. of the Canterbury Tales.

FINE ART.

The Art of Velasquez. By R. A. M. Stevenson. (Bell.)

By the very title of his finely printed and admirably illustrated book, Mr. Stevenson informs the world of the precise extent of its intended limitations. The volume is the essay of a critic, not the task of a biographer. Curtis and Sir Stirling Maxwell and Justi—who, above all others, has been elaborate and detailed in his treatment of the one very great master whom the Art of Spain has produced—find no rival in the work of a writer who has neither ignored nor has especially profited by their voluminous pages. The book of Mr. Stevenson is the record of a visit and an impression; it scarcely aims to be more, except that it adds to the interest naturally arising from the comments of the capable on a particular master that interest, which a thoughtful writer can scarcely suffer his work to go without—the interest, that is, of comparison, and more especially the interest which comes of the often incidental, but none the less useful, elucidation of the things that appear to him as the very principles of art. This then—and excluding all biography and many a dry-as-dust and merely specialist question as to the rightful attribution of work whose very doubtfulness must show it to be at best but second-rate—this is the real range of Mr. Stevenson's treatise.

Having, now, however imperfectly, defined the intention, I may pass, I suppose, to the further question of the execution, and may declare at once that it possesses the best qualities of Mr. Stevenson's writing. In a notice brief even as the present one—and addressed much more to the consideration of the claims of a particular writer than to the long-admitted claims of a great painter, still ever increasing in fame in the estimation of the wise—some attempt must be made to define what are indeed these "best qualities" of the writing of a critic known well to the higher journalism and in the art reviews, but who, if I mistake not, presents us in the instance before me with the very first of his books. From each of the opposite poles of contemporary criticism Mr. Stevenson is far removed; for, if certainly he does not approach the discussion of an artistic theme from the point of view of a sentimental imagination acceptable only when we could romance about art, and quite out of the fashion now that our grasp of it is firmer, neither does he now, or is he ever wont to, approach his subject as one to whom the qualifications of a trustworthy dealer—actual knowledge, or, failing that, cocksureness about facts—appear of greater value than the quality of aesthetic appreciation, subtle discrimination of merits as much intellectual as technical, and the power of delicate or vivid exposition of whatever artistic personality may chance to be under notice. Needless to say that both these points of view, whatever may be said in their disparagement, have their merits. Yet Mr. Stevenson's point of view is another one. He addresses us to some extent as a painter; but a painter in whom we find that rare being, one whose sympathies are not narrowed to a single school—who, indeed, has some prepossessions begot of training perhaps, more than of instinct, but who in the main is tolerant and many-sided, as if a studio, with all its cramping influences, had never known him. Moreover, along with that general appreciation which betokens a much wider mind than is discovered generally in those few gentlemen of the brush who elect to discourse to us as well as to practise, Mr. Stevenson has that outlook upon life, that intelligent grasp upon a thousand facts of it, which belongs, or should belong, to thinker or writer, but which we can scarcely ask shall be the characteristic of the dweller in studios, the practitioner, after all, of a craft in which there is much that is mechanical. And, in regard to his command of literary expression, rarely indeed do we find Mr. Stevenson deficient within the lines in which he has purposely set himself to move. Conceiving with clearness, feeling often with enthusiasm, he drives his matter home to us with directness and force. We do not always agree with him; we seldom fail to be interested in him. And where he is most emphatic he does not cease to be reasonable. One puts down his Velasques then, having received a stimulus that is not common: one trusts that in fulness of time the book may prove to have been but the first of a succession of such monographs, presented by one who is enough of a craftsman to be able to know, but—thank goodness!—so much of a writer that he can forget altogether that he is a craftsman at all.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

It has already been decided that the next winter exhibition at Burlington House shall consist in great part, if not entirely, of works by the late president, Lord Leighton.

THE following exhibitions will open next week: (1) a collection of pictures and drawings of Balmoral, Deeside, and the Highlands, by Mr. J. Clayton Adams and Mr. E. Wake Cook, at the Fine Art Society's; (2) one hundred paintings of Brittany and the Norfolk Broads, by Mr. W. J. Laidlay, at the Dowdeswell Galleries—both in New Bond-street; (3) etchings, drawings, and sketches, by Mr. William Strang, at the Rembrandt Head Gallery, in Vigo-street; and (4) facsimile reproductions in colour of old masters, at Messrs. Fairburn & Co.'s, in Regent-street.

THERE will also be opened next week the eighteenth spring exhibition of pictures at the Atkinson Art Gallery of the Southport Corporation.

THE usual two private views at the Royal Institute are fixed for Thursday and Friday next.

IN addition to certain of the pictures from the collection of Sir George Clerk—from Penicuik House, Midlothian—there are to be sold to-day (Saturday), at Christie's, certain pictures of the older English school, "the property of a gentleman." It is perhaps an open secret that this gentleman, whose properties begin with lot 135, is the possessor of English work of the finest and most interesting quality. There is, to begin with, an important family portrait group by that highly esteemed portrait-painter, J. Jackson, R.A. It was his last work; it was left by him not wholly finished, and was found worthy of exhibition at the collection of Old Masters at Burlington House in 1895. Then again, there is a whole group of the admirable animal pieces and other compositions and studies of that most sterling master, James Ward, R.A., who, though he worked quite early in the century, died only at the beginning of our own generation—a veteran indeed, and most full of years. At least four of the examples of his art to fall under the hammer to-day are of rare quality. They are: first, his own portrait, then the admirable "Old Horse in the Wind," and the study of a Boar's Head, and the small but significant panel "A Cow in a Stall."

ON Monday and Thursday of next week, Mr. A. S. Murray will deliver two lectures at the Royal Academy on "The Art of Asia Minor."

AT a meeting of the Society of Biblical Archaeology next Tuesday, Mr. Theo. G. Pinches, of the British Museum, will read a paper entitled "Assyriological Gleanings."

IN his lecture on "The Decoration of St. Paul's," delivered before the London Institution last week, Prof. W. B. Richmond stated that there had now been completed nearly 10,000 square feet of mosaic, exclusive of the gilding and painting of the barrel vaulting, of the design upon the stone work, and exclusive also of the windows. This included a figure of The Majesty in the centre of the apse, on either side two groups of Recording Angels; two panels of the Sea giving up its Dead; six panels of Virtues; the Sacrifice of Noah after the Flood, the meeting of Abram and Melchizedek; the creation of the birds, the creation of the fishes, the creation of the beasts; twelve herald-angels proclaiming the prophecies from chapter ix. of Isaiah concerning the coming of Christ; colossal figures of Sibyls, the Persian and the Greek; similar figures of David and Solomon, of Alexander and Cyrus, of two of the builders of the Temple, of Moses receiving the Law on Mount Sinai, of Job and his friends, of Jacob's Ladder, and of Abraham outside his tent, when visited by the angels promising him a son; three windows in the apse, and six clerestory windows representing angels singing in Paradise; and allegorical figures of Adam and Eve marrying the beasts. There had also been completed panels of peacocks, panels of fish, and panels of beasts, as well as panels of arabesque designs representing various Oriental flowers and fruits. The whole of the vaulting down to the main cornice of the choir would be completed by Easter; and there would then remain six spandrels to be finished, which would be accomplished before Easter of next year.

THE STAGE.

THE THÉÂTRE FRANÇAISE.

Paris: Feb. 15, 1896.

"GROSSE FORTUNE," M. Meilhac's new comedy in four acts, has the good luck to be played by the leading "sociétaires" of the Comédie-Française, with the additional attraction of the most exquisite toilettes. The plot and the characters are, perhaps, not particularly new; the dialogue, though elegantly written, may be thought somewhat wanting in the wit and traits of satire we expect from the author of "La Petite Marquise" and "Gotté." But these slight defects may be explained to a certain extent by the following anecdote, which is attributed to an influential member of the Comité de Lecture:

"Il y avait beaucoup de mots spirituels dans la pièce de Meilhac; mais comme notre public n'y aurait rien compris, on les a tous enlevés."

This may have been intended merely as a malicious skit at the "abonnés du mardi." However that may be, "Grosse Fortune" is a pretty, interesting comedy à la Scirbe.

The story may be told in a few lines. Pierre (M. Le Bargy), a very good and nice young man, has come, quite unexpectedly, into a large fortune on the eve of his marriage with Marcelle (Mme. Bartet). During the first two years of their married life the young couple revel in all the pleasures of society. But, as the old saying goes, "L'argent ne fait pas le bonheur." Pierre gets tired of his pretty wife, and, according to the traditional custom of French ménages, makes love to his wife's best friend, Georgette (Mlle. Brandès), the intriguing wife of the unscrupulous adventurer, M. de Marasly (M. Duflos). The guilty pair are discovered by Marcelle, who forthwith abandons her home and rushes off to her mother, who is delightfully personified by Mme. Pierson. Georgette soon throws Pierre overboard in favour of richer prey, so the prodigal comes back in the fourth act to obtain his wife's pardon, which leads to a very pathetic scene played to perfection by M. Le Bargy and Mmes. Pierson and Bartet. Thus this "moral play" comes to a pleasant termination amid the plaudits of a delighted audience.

The second act is enlivened by the appearance of M. Coquelin Cadet, attired as a gentleman-rider in pink jacket and sleeves, who proceeds to explain, amid roars of laughter, how he has won a race "malgré lui." Then comes the clou of the new piece, the effulgent apparition of Mlle. Brandès as Judith, a part she is to act in a tableau-vivant in which Coquelin Cadet figures as Holofernes. These two sensational "numbers" will probably contribute in no small measure to the success of the play.

CECIL NICHOLSON.

STAGE NOTES.

WITHIN the last few days the part of the fashionable clergyman's daughter in "A Woman's Reason" which was originally played by Miss Maud Millett, and afterwards for a short time by a young lady whose performance, though meritorious, was described in last week's ACADEMY as by no means equal to Miss Millett's, has been assigned to a fresh representative—Miss Kate Cutler. Under these circumstances it is fair to Miss Cutler to state that the reference to the performance in the dramatic article in last Saturday's ACADEMY was not intended to apply to her. She had not, indeed, at the time of writing, been seen in the part. It behoves us to point out this circumstance all the more perhaps because a high opinion of the talent of Miss Cutler—as shown in that which she has hitherto played—has been expressed more than once in the ACADEMY—with cordiality, we trust.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. MARK HAMBOURG gave a third piano-forte recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. He played Rameau's Gavotte and Variations in A minor with great skill and expression, although there was at times an attempt, not altogether satisfactory, to modernise. Then followed a Fugue in A minor by Bach, neatly rendered. This Fugue is not one of the composer's greatest; but, at any rate, it was more welcome than one of the transcribed organ fugues which pianists are so fond of playing. The most important piece of the afternoon was Schubert's Fantaisie in C, and in its interpretation the pianist displayed many excellent qualities. He used the Liszt version, and in so doing acted, we think, unwisely. The king of pianists loved to touch up the piano-forte works of his illustrious predecessors: in this case he has made few alterations, but these can scarcely be accounted improvements. It is not difficult to distinguish between the true virtuosic music written by Schubert and the meretricious ornaments of Liszt's: the two styles do not blend. Mr. Hambourg gave two studies of Chopin: the one in E from the first set, and the one in C from the second. They were both effectively rendered. In the second some alterations in the text were made, and it seemed to us as if these, too, emanated from Liszt.

The old Latin hymn "Dies Irae" has been set to music by many composers, ancient and modern: among the latter, the foremost names are those of Berlioz, Gounod, and Dvorák. The "Messe des Morts" of Berlioz is remarkable for its daring realistic effects; and, to a certain extent, the Requiem of M. Bruneau, produced by the Bach Choir at the Queen's Hall on Tuesday evening, is allied to that of his predecessor. Berlioz crossed, at times, the borderline which in art separates the real from the ideal; but by his masterly orchestration, and by certain moments of genuine musical inspiration, his offences are condoned. M. Bruneau has also crossed the line, and for his sins he, too, makes amends. His orchestration, though now and again effective, can scarcely be called masterly; yet his work is conceived with wonderful breadth and nobility, and he has made earnest endeavour to heighten the effect of the solemn words. The boldness with which the composer sets at defiance the ordinary laws of tonality and modulation; his apparent indifference to any harsh effects in part writing; his freedom of form—all these things render it difficult to pronounce judgment on the work. If adopted merely to give a false impression of originality, then they are deserving of censure. If, however, they are the natural outcome of the composer's originality of thought, the true expression of his feelings, they must not be submitted to cold analysis, must not be considered apart from their context, and must not be condemned straight away because they are strange or even unpleasant. The hard criticisms passed on some of the novel effects of Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner, and other composers of the past, should make one reflect carefully before passing sentence. To us it seems that the plan of the Requiem is nobly conceived, and that the music shows sustained thought; a cautious attitude with regard to its peculiarities appears, therefore, reasonable. There are sections of the work in which we find great effect produced by ordinary means, as in the "Quid sum miser et Rex tremendae majestatis"; there are others, as, for instance, the "Recordare," which display intense power and passion, free from any exaggeration; and again in the "Sanctus" there is lofty thought combined with great simplicity. And, further, never once does the composer descend to the commonplace. These are the portions of the work on which we base our high idea of its merits. If M. Bruneau had merely filled his score with lawless progressions, eccentricities of various kinds to hide his poverty of invention, then any simple passages introduced for the sake of contrast would at once have exposed his weakness. The power, however, which he reveals at such moments makes us accept on trust much to which we are not, at first blush, disposed to give ready acceptance. This Requiem, like the same composer's "Le Rêve," is almost sure to elicit various and even contradictory opinions, which seems to show that it is a work of no ordinary character. There are compositions which competent critics are able to accept or reject at a first hearing, but this is not one of such. Then, again, the performance, under the careful direction of Prof. Stanford, though in many ways commendable, was by no means an ideal one. The difficulties are very great, and every allowance must naturally be made for any shortcomings. Of the vocalists—Mme. Amy Sherwin, Miss Marian McKensie, and Messrs. Lloyd and Robert Hilton—Mr. Lloyd carried off chief honours.

The second part of the programme consisted of Beethoven's Oratorio, "Christ in the Mount of Olives," and it ought certainly to have been given first. In the Requiem we have an ambitious composer working on new lines and trying to rise to the height of his argument; in the other we have, on the contrary, a great composer, apparently indifferent to the pathos and nobility of his theme, writing, with one or two exceptions, down to the level of his day and generation. Beethoven, we know, in later years, expressed dissatisfaction with this work. If it had been the only one by which he had become known to posterity, his claim to immortality would indeed have been a slender one. We do not blame the Bach Choir for giving the Oratorio; it serves to remind us that even the greatest composers sometimes nod.

MUSIC NOTE.

A VERY instructive paper on "Pitch, and the History of its Rise and Fall," written by that excellent authority, Mr. A. J. Hipkins, was read by the secretary of the Society of Arts on Wednesday evening. Mr. Hipkins is strongly in favour of adopting the French pitch, and believes that its universal recognition in this country is only a question of time. Mr. Curwen and others afterwards took part in an interesting discussion; and, while holding the same view, pointed out some of the practical difficulties which for the present stand in the way of its immediate adoption. Sir A. Mackenzie was in the chair, and Mr. Hipkins, though unable to read his paper, was present.

The number of Free Policies granted during the year to those Policyholders of five years standing, who desired to discontinue their payments, was 59,352, the number in force being 448,816. The number of Free Policies which became claims during the year was 8,956.

The total number of Policies in force at the end of the year was 11,682,748: their average duration is nearly seven and three-quarter years.

At the end of the year the number of Policies in force under these tables as the result of three months' working was 169,791, producing an annual premium income of £82,974.

A Second Series of FLEET STREET EOLOGUES. Second Edition, Fcap. 8vo, buckram, 4s. 6d. net.

"Will more than confirm every hope that was aroused by his former volume with the same title. We hope that the extracts we have ventured to make at such length will send many readers to Mr. Davidson's volume. We should like 'St. George's Day' to be read by every man, woman, and child in Great and Greater Britain."—Daily Chronicle. "The best book that has been put forth for many a long day past is the second series of 'Fleet Street Eologues,' by John Davidson. The author has often given admirable expression to a passionate sense of the beauty of life, but he has never before done anything so complete as this. In 'St. George's Day' he has produced a song in praise of England that should be read by everyone wherever English is spoken. It might well enough be made the national anthem of the first of the great federations of the English which it foretells; and to know it should henceforth be a part of the education of every child whose birthright is our noble language.... The work of a real poet."—Black and White.

BALLADS and SONGS. With a Title-Page and Cover design by Walter West. Fourth Edition. Fcap. 8vo, buckram, 6s. net.

"We must acknowledge that Mr. Davidson's work in this volume displays great power.... There is strength and to spare."—Times. "Mr. Davidson's new book is the best thing he has done, and to say this is only a good deal. Here, at all events, is a poet who is never tame or dull—who, at all events, never leaves us indifferent; his verse speaks to the blood, and there are times when 'the thing becomes a trumpet.'"—Saturday Review.

PLAYS. "An Unhistorical Pastoral."

LITERATURE.

Tafilet: the Narrative of a Journey of Exploration in the Atlas Mountains and the Oases of the North-west Sahara. By Walter B. Harris. (Blackwoods.)

PROBABLY no living Englishman possesses a more accurate knowledge of the Sultanate of Morocco than Mr. Harris, who has resided for many years in different parts of the country almost more as a native than as a European, and whose contributions to the Journal of the Royal Geographical Society have greatly enlarged our knowledge of the Arabo-Berber populations, especially in the northern districts. But owing to the disorderly state of the land, the chronic warfare of the turbulent hill tribes, and the general lack of regular communications, his investigations had hitherto been entirely confined to the northern slope of the Great Atlas and to the coast ranges. Hence the opportunity afforded by the expedition of the late Sultan Mulai el Hassan to the southern region beyond the Atlas in the latter part of the year 1893 was eagerly seized by the author to extend his explorations in that direction, and especially to visit the little known Tafilet oasis, the goal of the Sultan's march and the cradle of the present dynasty. Hearing in the early autumn that the expedition, following the more usual route from Fez, was likely to reach the oasis in safety, Mr. Harris, at that time in England, sailed at once for Morocco, and was able to leave Marakesh on November 1, in company with a small but fairly well equipped party, "a faithful and uncomplaining band," without whose loyal devotion he could never have reached his destination.

Tafilet (Tafilelt, Tafilala), which lies about 300 miles east by south of Marakesh, is not known to have been previously visited by any Europeans except Caillié in 1828, and Rohlfs in 1862-64. Hence Mr. Harris has much to say about its present condition, its Arab and Berber inhabitants, irrigation works, products, and industries. The information, however, is mainly in the nature of a compilation, his stay having been limited to nine days, during most of which time he was laid up with a bad attack of quinsy, and also practically under arrest. For some unexplained reason the Sultan, who was now encamped in the oasis, gave him a most ungracious welcome, showing much anger at his arrival, and sending him back by the same route to Marakesh as soon as he had sufficiently recovered to face the return journey. Nevertheless the data here supplied are welcome and valuable, while the reference to the ruined city of Sijilmassa, in the heart of the oasis, will awaken interest in this now forgotten centre of Moslem culture during medieval times. The confusion long attaching to the names Tafilet and Sijilmassa (now Medinet el-Aamra) had already been cleared up by Rohlfs, who clearly showed that there never was a city "Tafilet," nor a district "Sijilmassa," but that Tafilet was always the name of the district of which Sijilmassa was the capital. This conclusion is now confirmed by Mr. Harris, who could find no trace of a town called Tafilet, his informants "one and all stating that Sijilmassa was the sole and only large town that ever existed in Tafilet"—that is, in the oasis. His explanation, however, of this term "Tafilet" seems open to question. The radical part of the word is undoubtedly, as he says, the district of Filál in Arabia, whence came the ancestors of the reigning dynasty. Mr. Harris is also right in treating the final t as a Berber feminine ending; but it is difficult to accept his suggestion that the initial Ta is the Berber At, answering to the Arabic Ulad, "sons of"; so that "the whole name may be said to signify the sons of the Filál (district)." For the prefix At is not applied to districts, but only to tribal names, and then properly only to Berber tribal names, which are not here in question, Filál, as seen, being an Arab place-name. The ta would therefore appear to be the Berber initial feminine prefix t, as in Tidikelt, Tugurt, &c., in strict accordance with such double feminine formations as in akli, negro; taklit, negress. Hence Tafilelt = Ta-Filál-t = Filál-land.*

In other respects Mr. Harris's observations on the Berber peoples whom he visited along the route, taken in connexion especially with his previous remarks on the Riffs and other Berber groups in the north, are of extreme value to ethnologists. Some years ago he described the Arabised Berbers of North Morocco—that is, Arabised in speech and religion—as "for the most part fair, with blue eyes and yellow beards, perfectly built and exceedingly handsome men" (Proceedings, Royal Geographical Society, 1889, p. 490). He now tells us that the Southern Berbers, those especially of the anti-Atlas, are noted for their good looks and handsome build, being above the average height, of fair complexion, aquiline nose, finely cut mouth, and sometimes even with blue eyes. The women also are "distinctly pretty, with very fair skins and clear complexions." Thus we find the regular features and light colour, supposed to be peculiar to Europeans, prevalent among all the Moroccan aborigines, while similar traits have been met by Barth and Lenz among the kindred Tuaregs of the Western Sahara. This universality of the type is the best answer to the suggestion that it may be due either to Roman or Vandal interminglings, for neither of these races ever spread very far from the seaboard, at least in Mauritania, and even in Tripolitania their farthest outposts were those of Phasania (Fezzan). Their names, however, were widespread, and it is interesting to find the term Rumin (Romans) still current in the trans-Atlas regions in the sense of Europeans, foreigners, and even Christians. When leaving Agurza, on the southern slope of the Great Atlas, Mr. Harris was greeted by the friendly natives with the words Arja, Allah ijibna or Rumin, "Come back again; God bring us Romans" (Europeans)!

* Cf. also Tamazigt—the Berber language, more particularly that of the Saharan Tuaregs. When stripped of its feminine, pre- and postfix particles, Tamazigt is seen to be the Maxyes of Herodotus (later Maxices, Masices)—i.e., Amsigh, pl. Imazighen. "Freeman," still the most general name of the Mauritania Berbers.—A. H. Keane, Ethnology (p. 384).

There was, perhaps, more reason for this mutual feeling of goodwill than either party could be aware of. As our knowledge of the Hamitic aborigines increases, it becomes more and more evident that the North African and European peoples belong fundamentally to the same primitive stock, which, as elsewhere shown by the present writer, had its origin more probably in the south than on the north side of the Mediterranean. From this cradleland of the highest division of mankind, the race spread eastwards through Egypt to Asia, leaving a record of itself in Prof. Flinders Petrie's "New Race" of the Nile Valley, and northwards across then continuous land to Europe in company with the late pliocene and early pleistocene African fauna. Later this primeval stock became modified in its original home by the reflux movement of differentiated Semites from Asia, and leavened in Europe by the spread of Aryan-speaking peoples over the whole of that continent. Thus, while the present inhabitants of North Africa may be spoken of as Hamito-Semites, those at least of West Europe, its peninsulas and islands, may be regarded as mainly Aryanised Hamites. But not all of them, for the little Basque group still surviving in the Western Pyrenees has preserved the original mother-tongue, which the late G. von der Gabelenz regarded as a member of the primitive Ibero-Berber stock language.* If this view be confirmed by further linguistic inquiry, a solution will be afforded of one of the great fundamental problems in the evolution of the human family.

Nor need we Europeans be ashamed of such a connexion. Mr. Harris, who has had such exceptional opportunities of studying them in situ, speaks in glowing terms of the many noble qualities by which the lawless and apparently ferocious Berber tribes of Morocco are favourably distinguished from their Semitic (Arab) neighbours. They are lawless and turbulent, thanks to generations of misrule, and in virtue of that undying love of freedom, which is expressed in the national name, and which has saved them from extinction during the thousands of years that they have been successively exposed to the attacks of Phœnician Semites (Carthaginians), Romans, Vandals, Byzantine Greeks, and Arabs. But in their mountain homes Mr. Harris found them everywhere genuinely kind, gentle, frank, and unselfish to an extraordinary degree.

"Fierce as they are in war, the people of * Die Verwandtschaft des Baskischen mit den Berbersprachen Nord-Afrikas nachgewiesen. (Brunswick, 1894.)

Dads [in the anti-Atlas region] are when at peace the gentlest of creatures, extremely devoted to their children, and living a home-life absolutely unknown among the Arabs. Just as in appearance, so in moral character, do they excel, and the vices so common among the Moors [sedentary town Arabs] are unknown in the homes of the Berbers. They seem to possess none of the uncontrollable passion that is so large a feature in the Arab character, and its place is taken by affection and sincerity."

At Dads Mr. Harris secured the services of a native guide for the rest of the journey to Tafilet, who was a "typical Berber," of splendid physique, but whose heart "was even better than his looks; more than once as we tried to sleep of a night, our teeth chattering with the frost, he would cover me with his warm cloak, sharing it with me until I slept, when he would give up his half so that I might be warmer, and in the morning tell me half a dozen lies, saying that he had been so hot he had kicked it off, and it was only by accident that I found myself warm and comfortable and him half frozen."

So trustworthy did he prove, that Mr. Harris, travelling in the disguise of a Mahomedan pilgrim, did not hesitate to reveal himself to his Dadsai friend, who kept the secret loyally, and, in fact, regarded the affair as "a tremendous joke, reiterating his approval of my venturing where none had ever trod, and where my life, if discovered, was worth probably about half an hour's purchase."

The book is beautifully printed, and enriched with numerous excellent illustrations prepared by Mr. Maurice Romberg from sketches and photographs by the author. There is also a sketch map of the route, and an index, which, however, is a specimen of what an index ought not to be. References are given without the least discrimination to every page where a name occurs, so that "Arabs," for instance, is followed by fifty figures, "Berbers" by eighty-four, "Tafelet" by thirty-eight, and so on. Such an embarras de richesses defeats its purpose, unless that purpose be to try the patience of the student beyond all endurance.

History of the Post-office Packet Service, 1793-1815. By Arthur H. Norway. (Macmillans.)

THE records of the Post-office, which slumbered in neglect for many a decade, have within the last few years been stirred into activity. Chronicler after chronicler has arisen at St. Martin's-le-Grand, and claimed for himself a section of its history which he could call his own, and within which he could dig and delve. Mr. Baines has appropriated the history of the development of the telegraphs and telephones, and has imparted to us many a curious detail in the progress of the Office during the last half century. Mr. Joyce has taken a wider range, and has completed a full survey of its history from the establishment of postal communication, an inquiry which involved the protracted investigation of huge bundles of official documents. Another enthusiast, Mr. Hyde, has traversed many a by-way in postal life in search of romantic and picturesque incidents. Now comes another investigator into the past, and he has been fortunate enough to find a sphere of labour practically unexplored by any of his predecessors. This is Mr. Norway, who has seized on the chronicles of the packet-service during the long French War; and we shall probably not err in supposing that to him the task has been sweetened through a relationship with the Captain John Arthur Norway, whose gallant deeds are recorded in its pages.

The history of the packet-service during this period is practically a record of the prosperity of Falmouth. The town was not called into existence, the very name of Falmouth was not created, until after the restoration of Charles II.; and its life was due to the influence of the family of Killigrew, one of whom, from his activity in rushing about the continent of Europe with royal messages, was dubbed "Sir Peter the Post." The first buildings were erected about 1615; and the town rapidly expanded, so that when Hale wrote his History of Cornwall, at the end of that century, he was justified in penning the words:

"In this town his majesty hath his custom-house collector, comptroller, customs, surveyor, sea and land waiters, and from this town the packet-boats from Lisbon to America receive their despatches from their agent, to the great advantage of this place in times of peace and war."

Mr. Norway concludes his history with some reflections on the neglect which has befallen the memory of those who risked their fortunes and their lives in the attempt to maintain postal communications with our colonies and our fleet. It was not until he conversed in the churchyard of Mylor, on the slopes of the Fal, with its aged sexton that he could discover any precise information on the career of one of the brave combatants in this service. But had he examined the monuments within the parish church of Falmouth he would have found some memorials of more than one of the heroes commemorated within his pages. There are inscriptions on its walls to the memory of Capt. James Bull; Capt. Isaac Moorsom; James Ure, the surgeon on board Capt. Norway's ship the Montagu, who was killed in 1813, at the age of twenty-three; and, perhaps saddest of all, there is a memorial-stone for the passenger from New York who was slain off Scilly in defending the packet-ship against a French privateer.

The record of many a stirring deed of British pluck, fighting against long odds, will be found in the narrative of Mr. Norway. The packet-boats were often insufficient in size, they were frequently without the requisite weapons of defence, and the total of the crew always fell short of the numbers fighting in the vessels of the enemy. But the sailors in the packets rarely failed to render a good account of themselves in the struggle to which they were exposed, and in not a few instances they came off victorious over their foes. One or two of these combats—notably that of the Antelope, under Boatswain Pasco, "an illiterate fellow who could not write his name, but a brave sailor and a born leader of men"; and the fight of the Windsor Castle, when the ship was in charge of William Rogers, the master—have passed into history. But the recollection of most of them had perished, though they will now live again in the chapters of Mr. Norway. At one time the sailors at Falmouth "waxed fat and kicked," and for a few months the packets were moved from the Fal. But under the pressure of penalty the men proved more reasonable, and the Department speedily realised that the convenience of transport from Falmouth could not be paralleled elsewhere. The service was restored to the town after a removal of a few months, and happiness once more reigned supreme. The post-office agent at Falmouth during the crisis, a gentleman named Christopher Saverland, proved to be versed in the arts of diplomacy. His action was agreeable to his chiefs in London and also to the commanders of the packet-service. On his death in 1821, the captains erected to his memory in the parish church a tablet "in testimony of their esteem and high sense of his public character."

An unfortunate key-note is struck at the beginning of this volume. The first two lines of the prefatory remarks contain a couple of awkward misprints, which should not have passed without correction. We observe, a few pages later, that Mr. Norway does not seem to be aware that "the Spanish traveller, Don Manuel Alvarez Espriella, who visited England in 1808," was no other than Robert Southey. His observations are none the less true or amusing on that account, but they cannot be imputed to the keenness of a Spanish grandee. The reader who is undeterred by these points, and goes further in his perusal, will not be disappointed. The volume discloses an interesting tale and it is told with much sprightliness. Those who applauded the surrender of Heligoland to Germany should note the testimony of Mr. Norway, in his ninth chapter, to its value to this country in times of struggle against a whole continent—times which may recur at no distant date.

W. P. COURTNEY.

Poems. By Emily Hickey. (Elkin Mathews.)

It is less than ten years since Mr. W. B. Yeats published, in his Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry, a little tale called "The Countess Kathleen O'Shea," regarding which we are told in a footnote—"this was quoted in a London-Irish newspaper. I am unable to find out the original source." Since that time the tale has been made the basis of three noteworthy poems—the first by Mr. Yeats, the second by Mrs. Tynan-Hinkson, and the third, and last, by Miss Emily Hickey. To Miss Hickey's poem, which is called "The Ballad of Lady Ellen," there is prefixed a fine piece of prose, which contains the argument of the poem, and, as I want to say some things on the argument of the poem, I subjoin that passage:

"There was a very mighty famine in the land, and the people's cry went up day by day, and many of them died. And the Lady Ellen, their Duke's daughter, sold her jewels and her rich robes, that the people might have wherewith to stay their hunger: for her father, the Ruler of the land, cared not a whit whether the folk lived or died, and would not hearken to the praying of his daughter on their behalf.

"Then, when she had spent all she had, the lady went forth into the city, in the disguise of one of mean estate; that with her own eyes she might see the plight of the people, and hear it with her own ears.

"And lo! she learned how the emissaries of the Evil One were buying the souls of the folk, and how the folk were selling their souls that they might have bread for themselves and for their children.

"Then the lady, knowing this dreadful thing, prayed once more to the Duke, her father, on the folks' behalf, and found his heart as hard as the nether mill-stone.

"And so she sold her own soul to the Evil One for a mighty sum, and bought therewith food and seed-corn for the people.

"So plenty drove out famine, and the emissaries of the Evil One were hounded forth, not as at that time to return.

"And the soul of the Lady Ellen fared forth to hell, and lo! at the very heart of hell she found the Lord's heaven, and was laid to rest on the bosom of Mary."

This, then, is the story which is being set to music by those of Ireland who to-day keep green the memory of the harp that once through Tara's hall the soul of music shed. It is a beautiful story; but, says one of these harpists, "the source of it I know not," while another of them, the writer of the book here under consideration, goes further, and says: "It is, I am informed, certainly no Irish ballad." These are grave drawbacks to it as a theme for that harp of Tara; and there is another drawback to it which, to my thinking, is as grave. The beautiful tale points a very unbeautiful moral, no less unbeautiful an one than this: "The devil helps them who cannot help themselves." No one shall make me believe that the Isle of Saints is the home of the story which yields this shocking variant of the good old saw, "God helps them who help themselves." The young person will take grievous harm from this tale, and the old person—may I be allowed to say here that we do not show half enough care of the old person?—will take grievous harm from it too. These persons, both, have always been told that to go to the devil is to do a very wrong thing, for whatever reason it be done, and under whatsoever circumstances. Now the poem of the Lady Ellen, and both the poems of the Countess Kathleen, tell, to state the facts of this matter in plain English, how a very sweet lady, who was an Irish patriot, went to the devil, and thus obtained a temporary solution of the Irish question; for what has this question ever been but "a very mighty famine in the land, and the people's cry going up day by day, and many of them dying"?

The result of the Lady Ellen's going to the devil is that her soul fares forth to Hell; but, lest the Nonconformist conscience, which some philosophers among us are beginning to think is the all of conscience now left in the world, should be made too happy, we are told that on arriving in Hell she finds at the very heart of it the Lord's Heaven, and is laid to rest on the bosom of Mary.

All's well that ends well, but this is parlous eschatology. Besides, it is newest of newest. It is decadent, it is fin de siècle—only odious terms will describe its odiousness. It is so horribly unhealthy, that the unhealthiness of it must strike even that Scotchman (were he still living, as his like, by thousands, are still living) who—so the author of Obiter Dicta tells us—"could not for the life of him understand how a book could properly be said to enjoy either good or bad health," and who probably lacked the same perception in regard to a book's theme.

When we leave the ethical for the literary aspect of the three poems, the case presents itself in a different light. They are each and all of such singular beauty that I, for one, will frankly admit that, with eyes wide open to their moral defect, it would go hard with me, were I empowered to do so, to "call in" the whole edition of any of them.

To pass now to an analysis of Miss Hickey's ballad. With the exception of, perhaps, two couplets it is wholly admirable. The couplets are:

"But Lady Ellen, who loved them so,
Was gone from the sound of their weal or woe,"

and

"Let fiery-hearted rubles deck
Your rosed-white ears and lilled neck."

"Who loved them so" is not good prose, and it is execrable poetry. As for "rosed" and "lilled," these are words which may pass in prose of a certain type—the first of them is rather effective in the following words, which describe the dress of a lady of the end of last century, "head-dress in rosed toupet and laced cap"—but they will not pass in poetry of any type. Miss Hickey, as a poet, should leave such language as that to the poetasters. In the same way, as a scholar, she should leave such language as this to the pedants:

"No pestilential sloughs of decadence
Have ever clogged your spirit, fouled your sense."

These are words (they occur in the poem "Ad Poetam") that do not even run, but crawl; and the writer of them can make words not only run, but dance. She does so here. I return to her "Ballad of the Lady Ellen:

"Your maids must buck you royal fair,
With a golden circlet round your hair;
And a stately robe of cramoisie,
Set with the fine lace daintily.
Bid your ladies bring for you
The scented glove and the brodered shoe."

That is excellent. And this has the right note too:

"Goodly fair, indeed, to see Are piles of the red and the white money."

And this—

"She bad that none should come to her;
And she drew the bolts of her high chamber."

While acknowledging her indebtedness to the prose version of the Kathleen story given by Mr. Yeats in his Fairy and Folk Tales, Miss Hickey points out that she has made "very considerable alterations and additions." I am acquainted with her prose original, and cannot agree with her in this matter. The main difference between her poem and the folk-tale in question appears to me to be one of diction. The tale is written in racy Anglo-Irish, opening with the typical pleonasm: "A very long time ago, there suddenly appeared in old Ireland two unknown merchants of whom nobody had ever heard." Miss Hickey's poem is written in the dignified language which, in the Irish home of my childhood, we used to call "English-English," pronouncing that italicised word with just enough sarcasm to set forth what we considered to be the inferiority of English-English to Irish-English. As one who has, mayhap, not yet wholly shaken off old mental slough, I am led to close my remarks on Miss Hickey's beautiful ballad with this one—that in it, as in all her poetry, her style and language is just a little too English-English for an Irish poet. It is a high charm in the work of the best among her contemporaries that, without employing, at every turn, what English people somewhat vaguely call "the brogue," there is almost always noticeable in their language that lovely thing, the Irish lilt. If Miss Hickey is not to be ranked with the English-English poets—and we can ill spare any from our Irish-English ranks—she must put Irish tales to Irish music. But if she is willed to go over to the majority, she is assured of welcome so long as she produces work as exquisite as that which marks the sonnet which follows, and above which she has put a German name:

"My love beloved is mine, and I am his!
My poet beautiful and great of soul!
The coming days may bring me joy or dole,
But naught remains for me to gain or miss.
My soul hath met his soul in that still kiss,
My life stands fearless out, a perfect whole,
My brow is lucent with the aureole
Set round it by his great love's emphasis.
"I know not how such glory as this can be;
I am as one who, after heavy noise
Of tempest and the shouting of the sea,
Comes to a paradise of perfect joys,
Where every gift and grace, in equipoise, Goes round a sun of light, eternally."

ELSA D'ESTERRE-KEELING.

A History of Gardening in England. By the Hon. Alicia Amherst. (Bernard Quaritch.)

SOME four or five years ago Mr. Percy Newberry suggested to Miss Amherst that she should edit the articles he had contributed to the Gardener's Chronicle on the History of English Horticulture. The subject proved so fascinating that she was led to pursue it beyond its original limits; and the result is this beautiful and interesting volume, far too modestly described as "a handbook by which to classify gardens and fix the dates to which they belong."

It is really the most complete history of English gardening we possess; and in its compilation Miss Amherst has drawn from public records, monastic cartularies, and private documents a vast amount of curious and interesting information. It is, perhaps, open to question whether her mode of arrangement has been the best, but her insight and industry deserve the warmest recognition.

Gardening as an art was probably unknown in this country before its occupation by the Romans, and what progress was made by them in introducing it is a matter rather of inference than of fact. There is a tradition that one species of stinging-nettle was brought by them as an esteemed pot-herb, and probably many of the vegetables now in common use are of Southern origin. Not a few Saxon names of plants can be traced to Latin sources; and most of these—if not all—are attached to what we still regard as exogenous plants: e.g., the "mor beam" (mulberry), "ciris beam" (cherry), "fic beam" (fig), "Persic treow" (peach), and even "win treow" (vine). The kitchen-garden, as we call it, naturally preceded the pleasure garden. It was an almost invariable adjunct to the monastery, and to the religious orders must be attributed whatever progress horticulture had made in the Middle Ages. The earliest writers on the subject in English were Churchmen—Alexander Necham, Abbot of Cirencester, in the twelfth, and Bishop Grosseteste in the thirteenth century. But in the Middle Ages what has been called "the discovery of natural beauty" was made by the Italians, and slowly spread among those European nations with whom they were brought in contact. Gardens for beauty, as well as for use, came into vogue; and even in England kings and nobles learnt to care for them and, it would seem, to extract profit from them.

"Henry the Third's chief garden was at Woodstock; but he was not the originator of it, as there had been a garden there in the time of the second Henry. In it was the labyrinth which concealed the "Bower," made famous by the tragic fate of the Fair Rosamond. A halo of romance and mystery hangs round this hiding-place, but in reality labyrinths were by no means uncommon. There is evidence of the existence of labyrinths in very early times, and they, presumably, suggested the maze of more modern date. The first labyrinths were winding paths cut in the ground, and the survival of them is still traceable in several places in England. Of these Saffron Walden, with its encircling ditch, is the most striking example. Camden describes one existing in his time in Dorsetshire, which went by the name of Troy Town, or Julian's Bower."

Seclusion was the main object aimed at in the pleasure garden, where the arbour, or "privy playing-place," made of trees thickly intertwined with climbing plants, was a conspicuous feature, and scarcely less so the fountain or cistern of water. Of flowers those most in favour were the periwinkle, the marigold, violets, lilies (including the iris), and the rose:

"The savour of the roses swote Me smoe right to the herte rote."

Of course, as the fortified castle gave place to the Tudor dwelling-house, the garden had greater space allotted to it, and grew in importance. The principal features in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were the railed beds of flowers, with knottes, mounts, arbours, and alleys. Sun-dials and carved beasts holding vanes were interspersed among the beds, and "topiary work"—more grotesque than beautiful—became a fashion. Later in the same period new ideas were imported from France, Holland, and Italy; and from Bacon's Essay on Gardens we gain a good idea of the then condition of horticulture and its formal character.

"It was in Queen Anne's time that Addison and Pope first ridiculed the old style and sought to bring in the fashion of 'copying nature.' But the reaction and destruction of old gardens did not take place till later, when the theories they advanced had had time to spread. There is no lack of views and designs of gardens of this period. They are to be found in county histories, such as Plot's Staffordshire, Atkyns' Gloucestershire, and Dugdale's Warwickshire; also Beeverell Les Delices de la grande Bretagne et de l'Irlande, published at Leyden in 1707; in Britannia Illustrata, 1709, with a large series of views by Kip; and in other similar works. If the authors had foreseen the annihilation that was to fall on so many gardens, they could hardly have more carefully preserved their designs. But these pictures are mostly taken from some imaginary point, and give a bird's-eye view of house, gardens, and surrounding landscape in a conventional plan, regardless of perspective. Faithful representations though they may be in many cases, the formal garden, as they show it, has lost all its poetry: the pale tints of the tender shoots of the beech hedges in the spring, the soft green of the sheltering yews in winter, the secluded alley, or the woodbine-covered arbour, have no charm when set down in these stiff lines of black and white."

It is not necessary to trace the rise and progress of landscape gardening under the hands of London and Wise, Switzer and Bridgeman, and especially "Capability" Brown and Kent. They did good work in banishing the Dutch style and what Walpole called "the verdant sculpture" which disfigured the beauty of English gardens.

Miss Amherst has greatly added to the value of her book by her bibliography of gardening. She gives a carefully prepared list of printed books on the subject, chronologically arranged and carried down to 1837, and also the names of authors. Nor must we pass over without notice the numerous illustrations—many drawn from early sources—which adorn its pages, and the index which renders it complete.

CHARLES J. ROBINSON.

EARLY GERMAN MYSTICISM.

Meister Eckhart und seine Jünger; ungedruckte Texte zur Geschichte der Deutschen Mystik, herausgegeben von Franz Jostes. (Freiburg, Schweiz.)

This most interesting work is the result of a discovery of MSS. in the town library of Nuremberg, which reminds one of the celebrated recovery of the Waldensian MSS. by Henry Bradshaw in the University Library of Cambridge. In both cases the temporary disappearance was due to the errors of the catalogue. Both sets of MSS. throw light on nearly the same period of Church history, both deal with mystics: in the one case with orthodox, in the other with heterodox, mysticism; the historical significance of the one, the theological context of the other, is the more important.

The volume is made up of sermon notes written down by nuns of the Saint Katharine Dominican Convent in Nuremberg. After hearing each discourse the Sisters seem to have put on paper the passages which most struck them. It is not always easy to detect whether this was done from memory only, or whether the writers had some copy or text before them. At times it seems to be the one, sometimes the other. The lovely mystic prose poem in praise of suffering on p. 52, and the verses which follow, can hardly have been taken down from memory. But, however this may be, we cannot but be thankful to these Sisters for preserving to us these fragments of the teaching of their spiritual masters. Scarcely less gratitude is due for the descriptive catalogue of 404 books which fills nearly fifty pages of the Appendix. From the documents taken together we might almost fancy that the favourite occupations of these Nuremberg Burgher Sisters were like those of Milton's Fallen Angels in "Paradise Lost," bk. ii., who "retired

In thoughts more elevate, and reasoned high
Of providence, foreknowledge, will and fate;
Fixed fate, freewill, foreknowledge absolute
And found no end, in wandering mazes lost."

Not that I would insinuate that these good Sisters belong to the ranks of fallen angels; but rather that Milton, who has made a hero of his villain, is here ascribing to the fallen angels employments which would better befit spirits who had never lapsed.

If we consider this work as a contribution to early German mysticism, it is evident that it can be only a fragmentary one. We cannot be sure that the good Sisters thoroughly seized the meaning or reported the exact words which follow the phrases—"Maister Eckhart sprach" or "Bruder Heinrich sprach disen sermonen"; but, so far as we can understand their mysticism, it seems to follow the great outlines of nearly all Christian mysticism. The authors most frequently cited are the Pseudo-Dionysius, St. Augustin (into whose words the preachers or writers frequently read a meaning which the Father never dreamt of), and St. Bernard. The ruling ideas seem to be these: everything is contained in God, the world is eternal in the sense that it was eternally existent in God. God's self-consciousness or self-contemplation is the cause of all existence or being, because He was all things eternally in Himself. The Son is as soon as the Father had consciousness of Himself, and the Holy Ghost is the necessary result of the will and love of the same eternal act. To gain God the soul must lose itself in God, the guilt is that the soul cannot annihilate itself in God. Yet this does not lead to vague pantheism or to Molinistic nihilism. For freewill is necessary to all self-consciousness whether in God or man. God is the highest personality; the soul does not lose but enhances its own personality by its union with or absorption into God. There is, too, the favourite idea or fancy of the whole macrocosm of the universe being represented in the microcosm—man. These are abstruse and difficult matters, they touch on the most insoluble problems of Christian theology and philosophy; yet they are here treated of in the simplest language. There is no difficulty in the terminology or in the grammar, we seem to be reading over again the opening verses of St. John's Gospel; and we wonder as we read how this plain and simple language, this translucent style of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, should have developed into the involved grammar, the cumbersome sentences, the strange and harsh terminology affected by German writers of the nineteenth century.

To all who delight in mysticism it will be a real treat to spend an hour or two with these Nuremburg nuns, as they report in simplest phrase what their well-loved masters taught them in the days of old.

WENTWORTH WEBSTER.

One Hour of Madness. By Gilberta M. F. Lyon. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The Weird Ring of Aviemoor. (Digby, Long & Co.)

But for the wilful improbability—amounting to impossibility—of the closing incidents, Mr. Algernon Gissing's new story would take high rank as a study of humanity. But the final separation between Theodore Carr and his wife Laura is incredible: they are the sport of Mr. Algernon Gissing, not of the stars, which invariably fight in their courses for simple sexual love, and the morality which is based upon it. When she was Laura Blakenhurst, the bright, capricious daughter of a tyrannical squire, and he was a struggling, susceptible lad, he fell in love with her. It is quite natural, therefore, that when he, unmarried, again meets her as a widow, his old feeling for her should have been revived. But that, after they are married, he should sacrifice her, himself, everything, for the old man Benjamin Saloway, who has brought him up, and his daughter Emily, whom he has tried to love—but failed—is "agin nature" and therefore not "inevitable," although it is pronounced to be so by Laura when she comes to see how her husband and his sentimental experiment are getting on. Otherwise The Sport of Stars is one of the most notable novels that have appeared for many years. Mr. Gissing's analysis of the characters of the two contrasted representatives of classes and masses in his story—Geoffrey Blakenhurst, and the temporarily energetic and socialistic cobbler Benjamin Saloway—is perfect. Nor is it too much to say that his realisation of the evolution of character in Theodore Carr, who with a spice of healthy selfishness in him would have made a second Felix Holt, is almost worthy of George Eliot. Firkins, as a bour- geois Napoleon, is a very good study; and Major Kennet, as a rival and foil to the painfully serious Carr, is "good fun" of the quieter sort, although he occasionally recalls too readily Jerrold's Major Loo.

The Red Cockade is full of incident and well written. But it will not rank among Mr. Weyman's greater books. He has been over weighted with his "period," or perhaps his heart was not in it. He is invariably successful when he reproduces the romantically picturesque—or the picturesquely romantic—in French history. But epic or at least Carlylean force is needed to do justice to the French Revolution. The purely historic portions of The Red Cockade give too readily the impression that its author had "read up"—assiduously enough no doubt—before writing it. At the same time the struggles between the Revolutionists and their opponents are admirably told. In particular, that last fight or massacre, in which St. Alais, the true hero of the story, dies, is a magnificent piece of description. St. Alais is a fine specimen of the old noblesse, while the narrator of the story is a quite probable example of the politician who does not quite sit on the fence, but who cannot help his head being with the Revolutionists, or his heart being with the Royalists. In the representation of French family life of the socially higher orders, Mr. Weyman has no rival among literary artists—not even Mr. Conan Doyle. It is hardly necessary, therefore, to say that the St. Alais portraits, more particularly that of Denise, the heroine, are admirable.

A Master of Fortune is one of the very best of Mr. Julian Sturgis's stories—readable, human, full, of course, of eccentricity, but not infested with any smarter writing than "It was a midnight evening, all electricity in lights and temperaments, sparkling with real diamonds and with wit less real, roaring softly with a babble of words, crackling with frequent laughter." Mr. Sturgis shows rare skill in bringing together Carteret Ultimus and Millicent Archer, then parting and finally reuniting them with fierce quarrels and tears. Millicent in her character of adventures—who, owing to circumstances, takes to financial gambling—may seem a trifle too "bold." But in the end her true womanliness asserts itself. And Carteret's chum, Tommy Seafeld, is half-brother to Tommy Traddles.

There is a very great difference between Felix Dorrien and his friend Lord Southborough. Felix is "astonishingly handsome." He is tall, very slim, with broad shoulders, and carries himself with a superb air. His features are "as regular and perfect as an artist could desire or design." He had formerly worn a small moustache; but a gushing young lady in Washington, "addicted to sculpture," had induced him to cut it off, in order that she might make a cast of his head for what she described as a Greek god. Southborough, on the other hand, has sandy hair, freckles, and a big disjointed frame. Yet in the race for the good things of life, including a remarkably good woman, Southborough beats Felix. This is largely due to the fact that Felix, while he has many of the fascinations of Lord Beaconsfield's pretty political men, has also not a little of the unscrupulous selfishness of Randal Leslie in My Novel. It is true that Felix, unlike Randal, is not wholly bad. He repents him of his wickedness, and more particularly of jilting Rosamund Foster, the pretty girl whom he meets at Geneva, and in a sense compels to fall in love with him. But his biographer's object is to contrast the man who is all head with the man who is all heart, and to give the victory to the latter, or, in other words, to illustrate the superiority of the power which is purely moral over the power which is purely intellectual. And in this enterprise Mr. Lucas quite succeeds. It is in a state of depression, caused by the shameful conduct of Felix, that Rosamund Foster consents to marry Southborough. Having done this, she proceeds to make a man and a politico-social success of him, and in doing so makes a very good woman of herself. All this is very well managed by the author. He makes Felix, however, contract an unnecessarily uncomfortable marriage; and the end of the whole—the union between his daughter and Rosamund's son—strikes one as artificial justice.

The author of Comrades has certainly "put a great deal of work" and a very large number of characters into her book. What with vulgar life in slums and below stairs, and still more vulgar life in society, and murders and conspiracies, and up-to-date journalism, and deliciously idiomatic French phrases like vous connaissez votre monde, it really attains the dimensions of an ordinary three-volume novel. But it is, after all, but a weariness of the flesh: unreality and exaggeration characterise everything and everybody in it. Eldred Aulstyn, M.P., murderer, ally of foreign and home revolutionaries, keeper of flower-shops, would-be abductor of flower-girls, lover of foreign countesses, and conductor of a modern "actuality" journal, is an impossibility and a bore at that. As for the Jowskys, Blavinskys, and other Tapperwits who, in the long run, manage to make away with Aulstyn—they are artificial enough to deserve to be for ever in the company of Lord Roper, who "was a mischievous old man at the best of times, but he believed in sangre azul, and thought there was really no unpardonable sin in the social and moral calendar, except a want of savoir faire."

Something might have been made of the gin-loving and socialistic Windells and their more than ordinarily pure and lovely daughter Valencia, for there is no question whatever as to the industry of the author of Comrades. But she ought not to crowd her canvas, and should give up her Franco-English jargon.

A Woman of the Commune is in its way a careful historical study; but Mr. Henty does not here attain so great a success as in his excellent books for boys. For one thing, the dialogue is out of all proportion to the narrative; for another, the incidents, except, of course, the closing one, where Minette dies like the petroleuse she is, are rather tame. It was, indeed, a risky experiment to introduce an English artist into the life of Paris before the period of the Commune, and Mr. Henty has not succeeded. Outhbert Hartington and Mary Brander make a very fair middle-class Romeo and Juliet. But their love-affair is of no account whatever, even although Mary's father is a good bit of a scoundrel. Arnold Dampierre and Minette Dufaure are much more interesting, if Minette does somehow look like Trilby taken to fire-raising. The best thing in this volume is the account of the fighting between Germans and French around Paris.

A South Sea Siren is about as queer a combination of pronounced flirtations and amateurish debating-society discussions as could well be conceived. One gets tired of Mrs. Celia Wylde, the Cleopatraesque Becky Sharp, who plays the title rôle of the story; her "snowy bosom," "dishevelled hair," "passionate embraces," "half-draped figure," and quite undraped debts, are too much in evidence. One gets even more tired of her lover, Raleigh, who makes love to—or is made love to by—every woman he meets, from a commodore's wife to a milk-maid, as a preliminary to delivering long and incoherent speeches in a South Sea Tobacco—and Spirits—Parliament. Some of the declarations made in the name of what is termed "the law" are of a rather elementary character; for example,

"A true statement may be pronounced libellous, and punished as a crime; while on the other hand a false statement, even when made on oath, is not held to be perjury, unless it has a direct bearing on the case at issue."

Yet there is no doubt that the author of A South Sea Siren is familiar with life in Australia and New Zealand, especially in days anterior to the present, that he has read a good deal, and that he possesses a large fund of animal spirits. He has yet, however, to learn point and condensation. Poor Scotland has a great deal to suffer for; but it is rather hard that we should be told that the devil "did good service in the Middle Ages, and, according to Buckle, kept such a hard-headed nation as the Scotch in terror [sic] for centuries."

It is a pity that the author of a story having such an unmistakable air of historic reality about it as The Clockin Inn should have been so indifferent as to the accuracy of his English and of his Scots. Why, for example, should he, while reproducing the period of the '45, also reproduce such Cockney slang as "the party with the fat legs"? And why should he be so lavish of the word "tae," which, at the very best, is not independent Scots, but bad English, as in such a sentence as

"The lassie was delighted tae come tae Edinburgh, and made me promise no tae tell her mither; so Sir Michael he never could wun frae the army till yesterday, and when he called I was surprised tae see that the lassie had taen quite a dislike tae him and wouldna speak tae him."

Yet a good deal of spirit is displayed in the telling of the story, the hero of which is Will Scott, a Border smuggler, who by way of concealing his identity enlists in the rebel army. But all of course to no avail, at all events in the long run, for a human sleuthhound—Thomas Mason, a resolute Customs officer—is after him, and he has made a host of enemies in the persons of "women scorned." So, after innumerable adventures and hairbreadth escapes, Mason shoots Scott—to the delight of one of the old crones with whom the book abounds, and who tells him that he has killed the father of his own wife. The adventures, old hags, and older superstitions in The Clockin Inn are all good in their way.

Lord Malreward was a very terrible fellow:

"He was tall, rather over six feet; his face was spoilt by its satirical expression, his brow was low and broad, his eyes brown, which more often than not seemed to flash fire, so terribly passionate was his nature, but at times they looked dreamy and even sad."

In an hour of madness, although he "was proud and revolted at the idea of bringing trade into his family," he married "the wealthy Miss Frances Smith, tall, with red hair, angular figure, ugh!" He ought to have married Lady Nan; while Miss Smith ought to have married somebody else, though that somebody else would appear to have been rather "sensual." The expected happens. Lord and Lady Malreward grow more and more "apart." He loves Lady Nan, but she will not elope with him. His wife does elope, of course, and comes to grief in every way. When Lord Malreward finds himself "free," he would, of course, marry Lady Nan. But he has got into a wretched state of health and dies; and all that poor Lady Ann can do is to "say softly, 'Take me also, dear God.'" The plot of the story is thus seen to be altogether commonplace; nor does the Scottish scenery count for much. But Miss Lyon's sentences are delightfully short.

The Weird Ring of Aviemoor is very poor as a story, and even poor if it be regarded—as perhaps it should be regarded—as a bundle of legends and dissertations. Even the weird ring is, in modern slang, "a bit of a fraud." As for the plot, there appears at the beginning of the book the possibility of a good struggle for the possession of the hero Cameron, between Isabel the heiress and her governess-companion Elsie. But Cameron marries Lady Isabella Champneys, Isabel pairs off with her Captain Tournour, and in the last page Elsie appears as the wife of the celebrated Professor Pakenham "in the beautifully arranged study of a pretty garden-surrounded house at Oxford."

WILLIAM WALLACE.

CURRENT THEOLOGY.

Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts; being a History of the Text and its Translations. By F. G. Kenyon. With twenty-six Facsimiles. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.) It is to be feared that when the revisers of the Authorised Version spoke in their preface or elsewhere of a Massoretic Text and a Septuagint, or even merely of a "text" or "some ancient authorities," they were using words not always understood of the people. What, many persons ask, is an "authority"? What is meant by a "text," apart from a sermon? The natural history of MSS., their inevitable errors, the existence and causes of different readings, cannot be ideas very familiar to people who perhaps read little and have lost all tradition of other than printed books. It was most desirable that some competent person should explain things which, however well known to scholars and critics, lie quite out of the way of the mass of our fellow-countrymen and countrywomen. Mr. Kenyon tells the story in which these ideas occur with great success; and, as his information filters down from circle to circle, it will doubtless contribute largely to the general understanding of "The Book and its Story." He offers a good deal more than mere explanation too, as the word "Translations" in his title promises, and gives us, in fact, a very thorough handbook of one side, the external history, of our Bible. He tells us, not, to be sure, how and when the several books were written, but in what manner their words, once written, have been handed down to us. It is a subject every section of which has occupied the lives of many scholars, one of the very deepest interest to the world; and we shall be surprised if not only students who want to make some acquaintance with the principles of textual criticism, but also the whole mass of Bible-readers, be not grateful to Mr. Kenyon for his timely and valuable help. The plates by which he illustrates his subjects are very clear and beautiful bits of reproduction. His subjects themselves may be summed up thus: Why there are variations in copies of the Bible; what are our sources of information when we try to decide how a disputed passage ought to run; the form of the oldest MSS. of the Bible; the character and history of the Hebrew text; the Greek and other ancient versions of the Old Testament; the MSS. and ancient versions of the New Testament; and the English Bible, MS. and printed. We have read with special interest Mr. Kenyon's account of the preparation of the Authorised Version and the Revised Version. He has gone as far perhaps as it is possible to go in explaining the literary excellence of the former, and showing exactly wherein lies the superior accuracy of the latter.

"TEXTS AND STUDIES." Vol. III., No. 2.: The Fourth Book of Ezra. By the late Prof. Benely and M. R. James. (Cambridge: University Press.) Hitherto it has been to Hilgenfeld's Messias Judaeorum and Fritzsche's Libri Apocryphi that students have looked for the Latin text of 4th Ezra. The new Latin text presented to us now, based to some extent on MSS. unknown to Hilgenfeld and Fritzsche, is probably destined to supersede their labours. The late Prof. Benely—alas, that we should have to say "late"—had practically completed the revision of the Latin text when he died, but he left scarcely any material for an introduction. This deficiency has been supplied by Dr. M. R. James; but, though his work is on the whole well done, there are now and again blemishes which give us fresh cause for regret that the master hand which began the work was not also able to finish it. Thus, for example, Dr. James speaks of Prof. Benely's recovery of the Latin text of Ezra vii. 36-105 (see R. V.), as "the discovery of a lost chapter of the Bible," apparently oblivious of the fact that this section had long been accessible in the Syriac, Arabic, and Armenian Versions, and that its authenticity was universally recognised. He interprets the famous patristic quotation, "When a tree shall lie prostrate and again arise," as referring to the Resurrection of Christ, without showing the slightest consciousness that this application to Christ instead of to the cross is at all original. And among the parallels to the eschatological signs mentioned in Ezra v. we miss the commotion of the sea at the Crucifixion mentioned by Arnobius and Alexander of Alexandria.

Studien über Zacharias - Apocryphen und Zacharias-Legenden. Von A. Berendts. (Leipzig.) This monograph on the Zacharias Apocrypha comprises nearly all that can at present be said on an exceedingly obscure subject. As all students of early Christian documents are aware, Zacharias, the Baptist's father, is frequently identified with the Zacharias who was slain between Temple and altar; and, as the latter is spoken of as a prophet (Luke xi. 50, 51), his personality got mixed up with that of Zacharias the colleague of Haggai. It is thus often difficult to determine whether early Christian allusions to Zacharias literature point to the Old Testament or the New. There is some probability that the authoritative name of Zacharias was utilised more than once; and the most interesting part of the question treated by Dr. A. Berendts is the possibility of some Apocryphon attributed to the Baptist's father underlying that very neglected and under-rated work, the Protevangel of James.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Works of Joseph Butler. Edited by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. In 2 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) The novelty introduced by Mr. Gladstone into this edition is the division of both Analogy and Sermons into sections, with a heading prefixed to each, summarising the contents. This arrangement unquestionably facilitates reference to any particular passage in the works; and as this will probably be regarded as the standard edition of Butler, quotations from it will readily be verified by the running indications of chapter and section at the top of the page. It is more doubtful whether a student reading the work consecutively will find the headings which have been introduced an interruption or an aid to thought. Their wording, however, is harmonious with Butler's style; and once granted the propriety of taking this liberty with "the mere body and figure of works such as those of Butler," the process of analysis could not have been more skilfully applied. An index to the sermons is a new thing, and will be useful. The index to the Analogy professes to present, under one heading or another, all the chief points in the argument. It is sometimes a little hard to see on what principle some of these points have been placed under a particular word, as the arrangement is not merely alphabetical, nor again wholly in the nature of an analysis. It is necessary to look at Butler from Mr. Gladstone's point of view, and with something approaching to his knowledge of the text, in order to see the points of the argument in their right perspective, as he doubtless does. The volume of Essays, which Mr. Gladstone promises to issue shortly, will complete the work, and explain more fully his reasons for commending to this age the great eighteenth-century apologist.

Studies in the France of Voltaire and Rousseau. By Frederika Macdonald. (Fisher Unwin.) The avowed purpose of these essays being to study "the strong, true, and universal ideas the French Revolution took for its law, not in connexion with that event, but in their relationship to what is called 'the modern spirit,'" one cannot help wondering why nearly half the book is devoted to the rehabilitation of Rousseau's moral character. Nevertheless, it is probable that most readers will be far more interested in these irrelevant chapters than in the discussion, distinguished by much warmth and many digressions, of questions more obviously germane to the "strong, true, and universal ideas" afore mentioned. Miss Macdonald has no patience with "apostles of culture" who assert that the movement Voltaire led "served no positive and permanent spiritual purpose." But she thinks it is a sufficient answer to insist that, had Voltaire scourged intolerance a whit more tolerantly, Mr. Matthew Arnold himself might have perished at the stake; and she ends by virtually surrendering to the proposition that Voltaire "approached the religious question in an irreligious spirit." There is a chapter on Rousseau's educational theories which is lucid and suggestive, but full of repetitions; and another on the Social Contract in which Mr. Morley is severely taken to task for making Rousseau assume what he does not assume. Miss Macdonald is happier in her essays on Mme. d'Epinau, on Rousseau's treatment of his children, and on the authorship of the intermezzo "Le Devin du Village." She has had access to MSS. in the French Archives, and from the evidence of handwriting she has no doubt that there are extensive interpolations in Mme. d'Epinau's Memoirs, particularly in those passages which concern her friendship and quarrel with Jean Jacques. The account given in the Confessions (and grossly exaggerated by Lamartine and others) of the fate of Thérèse Levasseur's children is subjected to a long examination; and a most ingenious theory is started, according to which Grimm and Thérèse, and not Rousseau, should be held to blame in the affair. Miss Macdonald appears to succeed in proving that Jean Jacques, and not Grenet of Lyons or anyone else, really did compose the "Devin du Village," though we know from the Confessions that he did not scruple on another occasion to represent as his own composition a popular menuet which Venture had taught him. These three essays are very readable, if rather long. But neither they nor any others in the book have anything to say, except in a very general way, about eighteenth-century France. And considering that Voltaire is dismissed in one short chapter, it will occur to her readers that Miss Macdonald might easily have found a more significant and a more modest title than this of Studies in the France of Voltaire and Rousseau. The volume contains an incredible number of misprints, especially in quotations of French verse (with deplorable effects upon the scansion); and two excellent reproductions—of the Rouen portrait of Voltaire, and of Houdon's bust of Rousseau.

The Cid Campeador: a Historical Romance. By D. Antonio de Trueba y la Quintana. Translated by H. J. Gill. (Longmans.) Though not of equal genius, Trueba was put forth in the North of Spain as the rival of Fernan Caballero in the South. He did, or attempted to do, for the Basque Provinces what she did for Andalusia. Both reached their highest point in that style of descriptive fiction which the Spaniards so well call Cuadros de Costumbres. The audience to which both writers addressed themselves were the young, especially of the fairer sex. Trueba had, moreover, a pretty faculty of verse, which Caballero did not possess; but he approached nearer, both in prose and verse, to the great danger which besets all such writers, when simplicity degenerates into puerility, or even verges on insanity. It is not from authors of this class that we look for a great historical romance; they have neither the power nor the knowledge required to carry it out successfully. In spite of its inclusion in the "Coleccion de Autores Españoles" of Brockhaus; in spite of Mr. Gill's assertion in his Preface that "it is considered by Spaniards to be one of the best historical romances in their literature," El Cid Campeador is really a failure, and was admitted to be so by Trueba himself; and after one or two more trials he abandoned for ever the historical novel as beyond his strength. He here collected together, without regard to age or date, all the legends which tradition has assigned to or foisted on the Cid, and grouped them all in a conventional framework of what the Middle Ages are popularly supposed to be by those who have never studied them. The result is something very like the historical novels of Miss Porter, Thaddeus of Warsaw, &c., which were the delight of schoolgirls some sixty years ago. Such work lends itself easily to translation; and Mr. Gill has produced a version which, notwithstanding occasional slips (the worst is the rendering Gafo, a leper, by "a nervous affection," and thus spoiling one of the prettiest legends), is pleasing and readable, and sufficiently accurate. One who has read this need not trouble himself further about the Spanish original; he will find nothing more in it.

WE have received Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench for 1896 (Dean), which is of special interest as containing the statistics of the new Parliament. Such a work as this, being now in its thirtieth year, stands in no need of conventional praise. It will be a higher compliment to its general utility to submit to the editor a few critical suggestions. In the first place, would it not be as well to banish altogether the armorial engravings, both of persons and of places? These are appropriate in a Peerage, or even in a list of county families, where coats may be assumed to be authentic. But here the editor himself insinuates doubts; and even when genuine, they possess no hereditary interest. In the case of places, it is particularly absurd to see the arms of a borough transferred to the county division that now bears its name. In the biographies of members, the editor shows himself too dependent upon the information supplied to him by the members themselves. For example, on p. 136 it would be easy to fill up the dates of graduation, and to add that the M.P. in question is now a Q.C. and also a professor at the Inns of Court. Among the statistics, we should like to have the number of voters on the register for 1896 as well as for 1895. The section dealing with the Judicial Bench is less open to criticism, and is particularly valuable as being the only thing of the kind published. But here we would suggest the entire omission of the Vice-Admirals of the Coast, who are in no true sense admiralty judges, and the giving of more attention to India. We look in vain, not only for the Judicial Commissioner of Burma and the Recorder of Rangoon (who are much greater personages than many included in the Colonies), but also for the Judges of the Chief Court in the Punjab. On p. 342 a County Court Judge is stated to have been born in 1825 and called to the bar in 1843—which is absurd.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. W. E. H. LEOKY's new book, Democracy and Liberty, will be published by Messrs. Longmans & Co., in two volumes, on March 24.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will begin immediately the publication of a re-issue of the Works of Lord Byron, both verse and prose, edited by Mr. W. E. Henley, in ten monthly volumes. The poems will be arranged, so far as possible, in strict chronological order. The prose will consist of all the letters (public and private) and the diaries, removed from their environment in Moore's narrative, together with whatever new material the editor has been able to obtain, and annotated to explain allusions originally obscure or veiled of set purpose. Besides the ordinary edition, there is to be a limited issue, on hand-made paper, with proofs of the portraits.

Messrs. HODDER & STOUGHTON will publish this spring a theological book, by the Rev. Dr. John Watson, of Liverpool ("Ian Maclaren"), to be entitled The Mind of the Master, being a popular exposition of the teaching of Christ. Some of the chapters have already appeared in the Expositor.

Messrs. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & Co. announce The Life and Letters of Oliver Wendell Holmes, by Mr. John T. Morse, junior. Who will be the publishers of the book in England we have not heard.

Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS announce for early publication As we Are: as we May Be, by Sir Walter Besant.

AMONG the new features in this year's edition of The Statesman's Year Book will be maps showing the frontier arranged between France and England on the Mekong, the Pamir delimitation, the disputed boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela, and the new arrangements with respect to Bechuanaland. The sections relating to the navies of the various States have also been entirely reconstructed, so as to show the precise present condition of each fleet.

THE S.P.C.K. will publish shortly, on behalf of the Archbishop of Canterbury's committee, a penny Church History, written by the Bishop of Stepney.

MR. W. R. WILLIAMS, author of The Parliamentary History of Wales, has nearly completed a similar work for Herefordshire, from 1213 down to the general election of last year. He has been able to recover, from research among contemporary documents, the names of not a few members who are omitted from the official Blue Book; and he has expended much pains on the identification of unsuccessful candidates. In former times Herefordshire could boast of five boroughs, now disfranchised—Leominster, Weobley, Bromyard, Ledbury, and Ross; and it used to have its full share of Parliamentary petitions. The book will be privately printed, and issued to subscribers, in an edition limited to 200 copies, through Mr. Thomas Carver, of Hereford.

MR. FREDERICK MARCHMONT, of South Lambeth-road, is preparing for publication a popular Handbook of Anonymous and Pseudonymous Literature, both ancient and modern, compiled mainly from works that have come under his personal observation during fifteen years' experience as a trade cataloguer. The arrangement adopted is alphabetical, under authors' real names, with a full index to titles of anonymous books, pseudonyms, and initials. The number of entries will be at least 2000. Besides bibliographical details, short notices will be given of many of the writers.

MR. WILLIAM CUDWORTH, author of Round About Bradford, and other historical works relating to the district, will have ready next month a History of Manningham, Heaton, and Allerton, townships of the present borough of Bradford. The work will be profusely illustrated.

Messrs. OLIPHANT, ANDERSON, & FERRIER will issue about the middle of March Allan Ramsay, by Mr. Oliphant Smeaton, being the second volume of their "Famous Scots" series; and also a new volume of "The Golden Nails" series, entitled Lamps and Pitchers, by the Rev. George Milligan.

ANNIE S. SWAN's new volume, which will shortly be published by Messrs. Hutchinson & Co., is entitled The Memories of Margaret Grainger, Schoolmistress. It will be illustrated by Mr. D. Murray Smith.

MR. HORACE COX will publish immediately Professional Women upon their Professions, by Miss Margaret Bateson. It records a series of conversations with ladies of professional distinction, upon such subjects as acting, singing, painting, nursing, School Board work, clerkships, journalism, &c.

THE Sunday School Union will shortly publish Stephen: a Soldier of the Cross, by Florence Morse Kingsley.

Messrs. JARROLD & SONS will shortly add to their "Greenback" series of novels Ruth Farmer, by Miss Agnes Marchbank; and also a new edition of The Last of the Haddons, by Mrs. Newman.

A DRAMA, founded on the life of Francis of Assisi, by Mr. Henry W. Maughan, entitled The Saint of Poverty, will be issued very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MR. W. J. SINKINS, of Paternoster-square, will publish shortly a book entitled A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands, by Mr. A. Farnese, giving the experience of a soul after death, with an account of the Astral Plane and its inhabitants.

THE History of the Mutiny by Sir John Kaye and Colonel Mallett, and also the works of Mr. Haws and the late Richard A. Proctor, have been transferred by Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co. to Messrs. Longmans.

MR. ANDREW LANG's romance of the days of Jeanne D'Arc, A Monk of Fife, has already passed into a fourth edition.

MR. RICHARD H. VICTORY's forthcoming book, The Higher Teaching of Shakespeare, announced in the ACADEMY of last week, is a volume of prose essays, not of verse.

A COMMITTEE has been formed at Nuneaton, the "Milby" of George Eliot, to collect funds for a public library, to be called by her name, and to serve as a museum of relics associated with her.

THE March number of Macmillan's Magazine contains a personal reminiscence of the late Alexander Macmillan, by one who knew him for nearly forty years; but there is one statement in it about which we confess that we should like additional confirmation. It is affirmed, as with authority, that the crowned head at the top of the familiar cover of the magazine is that of King Arthur. The other three are, of course, Chaucer, Shakspeare, and Milton; and we had always assumed that the fourth could be no other than King Alfred. The presentment and his position in English literature seem to support this. Perhaps Mr. W. J. Linton—who was doubtless the artist as well as the engraver—may be able to remove the doubts that we still feel.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

IN Congregation at Oxford, on Tuesday, the resolution in favour of admitting women to the degree of B.A. was rejected by 215 to 140 votes—a majority of 75 in a very full house. Consequently, the series of resolutions defining the conditions under which the degree should be granted to women were abandoned. The consideration of alternative resolutions, proposing to confer upon women diplomas or certificates, was postponed till Tuesday next.

THE discussion that took place at Cambridge on February 26, upon the admission of women to degrees, is printed in the current number of the University Reporter, where it fills nearly twenty columns. No such demi-official record is ever published of speeches at Oxford.

THE grace for appointing a syndicate at Cambridge to consider the whole question of granting further rights to women will be submitted to the vote on Thursday next.

FOR the professor's place in the Hebdomadal Council at Oxford, vacant by the resignation of Mr. T. Balaigh (on his appointment to the magistrature of the Privy Council), two candidates have been nominated—Prof. Dicey and Prof. Lock, who may be regarded as representing the two parties into which the university is divided for academical purposes. The election will take place on March 19.

THE Right Rev. Dr. G. R. Eden, Bishop of Dover, has been appointed lecturer in pastoral theology at Cambridge for the current year.

AT the invitation of the faculty of law at Oxford, Dr. James Bryce, late professor of civil law, will deliver a public lecture on Saturday next, in the hall of All Souls College, upon "The Constitution of the two Dutch Republics in South Africa."

AT Cambridge, as at Oxford two years ago, arrangements have now been made for the training of student interpreters, sent to pursue their studies in the university by the Foreign Office.

IT is interesting to notice that Mr. A. J. Balfour has been appointed an elector to the Knightbridge chair of moral philosophy at Cambridge.

AT the meeting of the Cambridge Anti-quarian Society held on Wednesday of this week, Mr. J. Bass Mullinger was to read "Notes on the Relations of Lord Bacon [sic] with the University of Cambridge."

THE public lectures of the Rev. J. E. Odgers on "Christian Archaeology," referred to in the ACADEMY of last week, are being delivered at Manchester College, not at Mansfield.

A CORRESPONDENT calls our attention to an announcement in the Cambridge University Reporter that, at a meeting of the Philosophical Society next Monday, a description will be given of the skulls found at Giron in 1881. He presumes that the date is so fixed as to exclude the disturbing element of female education.

DR. ROBERT PRIEBSON, who has just brought out the first volume of his monumental work, Deutsche Handschriften in Englischen Bibliotheken (Erlangen, 1896), has been appointed lecturer in English at University College, Liverpool.

MR. T. H. ISMAY, on behalf of the White Star Line Company, has offered £2000, to found a scholarship for nautical engineering and marine architecture at University College, Liverpool, as a memorial of the late Sir Edward Harland.

THE Rev. Dr. John Watson, of Liverpool, known in literature as "Ian Maclaren," has been appointed to deliver the Lyman-Beecher lecture on "Preaching" at Yale University.

UNDER the title of "Prussia Scholastica" (Leipzig: Spitzgatis), M. Perlbaach has reprinted from the Monumenta Historica Warmiensis a catalogue of all the Prussians (East and West) whose names are to be found on the registers of universities in the Middle Ages. The period covered extends from 1313, the earliest entry to be found at Paris, down to the beginning of the sixteenth century. The total number of names is just 4000, of whom no less than 1213 were at Leipzig and 962 at Cracow. Then follow—Vienna, 431; Prague, 299; Frankfurt, 296; Rostock, 221; Cologne, 159; Bologna, 109. The value of the catalogue is greatly enhanced by a series of elaborate indices, classifying the places of origin according to dioceses, and also the Christian and surnames. Among the Christian names, as might be expected, John vastly predominates, while Nicholas has a good second place. Other names well represented are George, James, Peter, and Martin. We are surprised to find only fourteen Williams, nine Fredericks, and three Ottos.

The English universities are conspicuous by their absence; and, unfortunately, we are unable to contribute much information. The earliest Register of the University of Oxford, from 1449 to 1571, edited by the late C. W. Boase for the Oxford Historical Society, has no classified index. The second instalment of the Register, from 1571 to 1622, edited by the Rev. Andrew Clark, not only collects the names of all Germans, but also arranges them (where possible) under their towns or provinces. We have not taken the trouble to extract those who must be Prussians; but it may be worth while to mention here the names of the following, expressly described as "Prussians," who are recorded as having read in the Bodleian Library between 1603 and 1613: Francis Benckendorff, John Coy, Philip Cluverius, Constantius Farenheid, and Reinhold Farenhad.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

AT BEDFORD, E. H., FEBRUARY 25, 1896.

I SAW the mortal laid beneath the sod,
With carven cross above her breast.
I knew the immortal spirit was with God,
A bright, pure soul had gained eternal rest.
First of a band of friends to pass away,
Her busy, useful life on earth is done;
Ended for ever is our toilsome day,
For her the promised rest has now begun.
I stood and heard the solemn accents fall,
"I am the resurrection and the life."
God, whose great mercy watches over all,
Had t'en my friend from out our earthly strife.
We left her lying in her peaceful bed,
Until the dawning of that last great day,
Trusting in One who long ago hath said
That He will wipe all bitter tears away.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for March opens with an ante-Nicene Homily of Gregory Thaumaturgus, translated for the first time by Mr. Conybeare, with a prefatory note defining the genuineness of the homilies ascribed to this Father. Prof. Ramsay replies to Dr. Sanday on St. Paul and the Jewish Christians in 46 A.D. The weight of his reply is somewhat diminished by its personalities. Is his mind really so "non-theological," really so "commonplace," or normal in its working, as he supposes? That he is original and, to discriminating readers, instructive, in spite of his peculiarities, we very gladly admit. A striking sermonette by Dr. Dale will find readers. Dr. Bruce shows much insight in his treatment of Luke's idealised picture of the Christ, as also Dr. Abbott in his subtle inferences from phrases in the Greek text of John xi. (raising of Lazarus). Dr. John Watson, discoursing on "Jesus our Supreme Teacher," repeats unintentionally one of Jowett's last utterances, that the Church has not yet tried the Christianity of Christ. Dr. Dods, in his survey of recent literature, gives the longest notice to Dr. R. F. Horton, on the Teaching of Jesus.

THE Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for February opens with a critical examination of the MSS. describing the War of the Comunidades attributed to Gonzalo de Ayora. He decides against their authenticity, though they are contemporary documents, and prints extracts showing how the news of the election of Charles V. to the Empire was received at Valladolid. Then follows an account of church architecture in Barcelona in the fourteenth century by Padre F. Fita. A voluntary church rate was voted for the expenses of building; and when some parishioners wished to decline payment the king, En Jaime II., in 1302, enforced the "talliam quam fecerunt et major et sanior pars ex dictis parrochianis"—the minority must be bound by the majority. E. S. Dodgson has another instalment of Basque inscriptions, chiefly sepulchral, but of greater interest than those of last month. Padre F. Fita also gives an interesting account of the parish church of Baddalona, and of the carving and painting of the retables and other ornaments.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LECTURESHIP IN ENGLISH AT CAMBRIDGE.

Cambridge: Feb. 29, 1896.

A grace for establishing a lectureship in English has lately passed the Senate, on the understanding that the income would be guaranteed by myself for the first five years.

It has rightly been objected that this is unsatisfactory, and I am therefore prepared to make up half the deficit (now amounting to about £400) before the first payment is made.

Before taking this step, I venture to ask for further support from all well-wishers who have not hitherto subscribed to the fund, and who may possibly be inclined to do so, now that smaller donations will go far towards extinguishing the debt.

I may note here that thirty-one resident members of the Senate have generously given £506 15s., and we are indebted for £42 17s. to seven members of the University of Oxford. The whole sum subscribed amounts to £1331 7s. 6d.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

CHAUCER'S BOETHIUS TRANSLATION.

Oxford.

On p. 18 of vol. ii. of his edition of Chaucer's works, Prof. Skeat, in enumerating the various English versions of the "Consolation," refers to MS. Auct. F. 3, 5, in the Bodleian Library, as containing a "prose translation [the italics are Prof. Skeat's] different from Chaucer's." From this summary description it is evident that Prof. Skeat has not examined this MS.; for it is Chaucer's version itself that we find in it, disguised to a certain extent, and equipped with a commentary containing the usual array of metaphysical explanations of Boethius current at the time. Whether the author wished the text to pass for his own, or merely intended to add a commentary to Chaucer's translation (which certainly stands in need of one), is not clear from the words of his preface. He says (fol. 198):

"For als meche as eche a boke oweth worthily to be hadde in prys, charged and lovede aftur the worthynesse of his auctor and the profyte of the mater tretid therein, therefore as anemptes the boke of counfort, the weche with lowly subeccoun of myself to coreccoun of alle wiser, principally for ese of myself and thenne for other goode frendes, I take in purpos to telle the menyng of it in engellysche as nere to the entent of the auctor as I am disposide be grace of the goode lorde above."

In either case, however, it is not possible to consider the work which we have before us as an independent translation of Boethius' "Consolation." A few specimens, taken at random, and arranged in parallel columns with Chaucer's text, will make this clear.

From this we see that the translation which the commentator had before him was Chaucer's; that he paraphrased his original, and, by changes of construction and other apparent devices well known to the modern schoolboy—

"the same with intent to deceive"— he made his text as unlike his original as he dared without altering the sense; that in MS. Auct. F. 3, 5, we have to do with a copy of an earlier one; the strange evolution of Chaucer's "whan I soughte with thee secrets of nature" into "whanne I saw with the Socrates of kynde," would indicate that the MS. had passed through the hands of at least two scribes. We can go even further, and point out the class to which the MS. from which the author copied belonged. A comparison of this version with the known texts of the "Boece" makes it clear that it goes back to the MS. from which were derived Add. 10,340, edited or the Chaucer Society and the Early English Text Society by the late Dr. Morris, and the MS. at Salisbury (see Anglia, ii. 373). I might add that the language is East Midland, with a sprinkling of Northern forms; and that the handwriting, according to the opinion kindly given by Mr. Madan, is not later than the third quarter of the fifteenth century.

* The abbreviation of the first syllable of this word, both here and below, is that for per, not pri, as in "prise," in the second line of the passage first quoted.

This MS. is very interesting, as throwing light on Chaucer's "Boece," for in it we have the evidence of a contemporary as to the meaning Chaucer's translation conveyed. Unfortunately, however, it is incomplete, and does not reach beyond the first book. Nor is it to be expected that another and completer copy will turn up, though one may exist somewhere, and have lain undiscovered from having been inadequately described in some such notice as that which has given rise to this letter.

MARK LIDDELL.

P.S.—In my letter on "The Verb deech," in the ACADEMY of last week, please make the following corrections: for "daikit," read "daikit"; in the reference to vol. v. of Ellis's Early English Pronunciation, for "p. 723," read "p. 712"; and for "an i-sound in N.E. green," read "an i-sound as in N.E. green."

TAVERNIER'S TRAVELS.

Wimborne: Feb. 14, 1896.

The travels in India of M. Jean Baptiste Tavernier have been admirably edited by the late Dr. V. Ball (2 vols, 1889). It may be worth while to add a few notes on passages where, from insufficient local knowledge of the Ganges-Jumna Duab, he was possibly mistaken, or which he was obliged to leave unsolved.

1. (Vol. i., p. 96.) Tavernier writes:

"Delhi is a large town near the River Jumna, which runs from north to south, then from east to west, and having passed Agra and Kadioue, loses itself in the Ganges."

Dr. Ball suggests that "Kadioue" may be Etawah; but it is almost certain that Tavernier (vol. i., p. 113) calls Etawah "Estanja." "Kadioue" is certainly Khajua, on the old Imperial road, in the present Fatehpur district. There Aurangzeb defeated Shuja in 1659 A.D., and built a hostelry (sarai) to commemorate his victory. The identification has been already made by Mr. Archibald Coustable in his edition of the Travels of Bernier (p. 75, note).

2. (Vol. i., p. 104.) Bernier gives his stages from Delhi to Agra as follows: Badelpoura. Paluel-ki sera; Cot-ki -sera; Cheki sera. These Dr. Ball identifies with Budurpur, Palwal, Kotwán, and Shaikh kisarai. Working out the distances as given by Tavernier and comparing them with Bishop Heber's Journal, I would suggest that the stages were Ballabhgarh, Palwal, Kosi, and Jamálpur, which last is just outside the present civil station of Mathura. There were Imperial sarais at Kosi and Jamálpur. The last may have taken its name from some Shaikh Jamál, its owner or occupier, hence the name given to it by Tavernier.

3. (Vol. i., p. 105.) He makes the distance from Mathura to Agra eleven kos, or about twenty-two miles. It is really about thirty miles. The intervening stage he calls Good-ki-sera. What this may mean I am unable to explain; but the distance from Mathura, about five kos, would bring him near Farah, an important place in those days, which is twelve miles from Mathura. Heber, when marching along the same road, made his halts at Farah and Sikandra, where Akbar was buried.

4. (Vol. i., pp. 113 sqq.) There is again considerable difficulty about the stages from Agra to Alláhábád. Tavernier gives them as—Beruzabad, Serail Morlides, Estanja, Haii-mal, Sekandra, Sanqual, Cherourabad, Serail Ohageada, Serail Atakan, Aurangabad, Alinchan, Halabas. About some of these there can be no question—Estanja (Etawah), Beruzabad (Firozábád), Haii-mal (Ajit Mal), Sekandra (Sikandra), Sanqual (near Músanagar, the site of which is fixed by the river Sengar which Tavernier crossed), Atakan (Hathgáon), Alinchan (Alam Chand). Working out the distances by the map, it is possible that Morlides is Saraganj in the Mainpuri district. Morlides probably represents Murali-dees, "the land of Braj or of Krishna in his form as Murali-dhara, or the flute-player." Cherourabad must, I think, be Kora-Jahánábád, in which case the intervening half-stage, which Tavernier calls in the original Gianábád, would be Ghátampur. If this be correct, the stage between Kora and Hathgáon (both in the Fatehpur district) may be Fatehpur itself, though the distances do not exactly tally. In any case Dr. Ball's identification of Aurangábád with Kadioue (Khajua) cannot stand, as it is west of Hathgáon, while in Tavernier's itinerary it is east. I suspect that Aurangábád is Kara in the Alláhábád district, and that Tavernier blundered about Aurangábád (Khajua), through which he passed on his way to Atakan or Hathgáon. That this supposition is probably correct, is shown by a comparison of the distance which he gives from Alinchan, which must—from its position, about two leagues from the Ganges—be Alam Chand.

5. Dr. Ball has, I think, correctly identified the marches from Halabas (Alláhábád) to Banarou (Benares), Sadoul-serail (Saidábád), Yakedil sera (Jagdis Sarai), and Boraky sera (Bábu ki sarai).

6. (Vol. ii., p. 166.)

"I drew the packet of English letters from the pocket of my greatcoat, and giving it to one of my servants to place in the boullas, which is the valise of these countries."

Dr. Ball suggests for bouchha the Persian posha, "covering." This is impossible. It is really bugcha or bugcha, "a wallet or knapsack."

7. (Vol. ii., p. 186.)

"The remainder of the people who do not belong to either of these four castes (Bráhma, Kahatriya, Vaisya, Súdra) are called Paussocour."

Dr. Ball suggests Pariah or Phánsigar Thaga. This is very improbable. Tavernier may have confused the title of the five northern Bráhma sub-castes, the Pancha Gauda, or the five tribes of Gaur Brahmins.

8. (Vol. ii., p. 198.) The idol Mamaniva, "The representation of the first woman," is possibly Māma Devi, the mother of the gods.

9. (Vol. ii., p. 232.) Bainmadou, "who was formally a great or holy personage among them," cannot be, as Dr. Ball suggests, Bhima Mahádeva, an impossible collocation. The word is nearly correctly given, Beni Mádhó, Veni Mádhava, the deification of the sacred junction of the Ganges and the Jumna rivers.

10. (Vol. ii., p. 237.) The deity Richourdas is properly Ranohhor Dás, "he that avoids the field of battle," a favourite title of Krishna.

11. (Vol. ii., p. 233.) The deity Morli Ram of which Dr. Ball was unable to give any explanation, is Murali-dhara, Krishna in his manifestation as the flute-player, to which reference has been already made.

12. (Vol. i., p. 41.) Tavernier's Manaris, "who have no other trade but to transport provisions from one place to another," must be the Banjāras. They cannot possibly be, as Dr. Ball suggests, the Munda or Mundári Kols. The Banjāras, by the way, are sometimes called Labāna, not Lubbāna, a name which is probably derived from their trade as carriers of salt (Sanskrit lavana, "salt.")

WILLIAM CROOKER.

THE SIN-EATER IN WALES.

Higborth, Gloucester: March 2, 1896.

It seems generally agreed that the valley near Llandeibie referred to by Mr. Moggridge as the scene of the custom of Sin-eating was Cwmamman. If this be so, the evidence of the schoolmaster of Llandeibie (by name John Rowlands) is of little weight. The parish is a very large one. The village, containing the church and the national school, is at one end, the district bordering on Cwmamman at the other. Fifty, or even thirty, years ago the upper part of the parish (towards Cwmamman) was almost a terra incognita to the vicar and the schoolmaster. At least, it was beyond their influence; and probably it is so still. I am informed by Mr. J. P. Owen that both the vicar of Llandeibie and the schoolmaster mentioned by Canon Silvan Evans were known to him; that they were both strangers to the parish, and that neither of them stayed long enough to identify himself with it. Cwmamman is in the heart of a romantic country. Around it are spots renowned for the hunting of Twrch Trwyth by King Arthur. Across the mountains, only a few miles away, is the famous Van Pool, the dwelling-place of the mysterious lady from whom the physicians of Myddvai traced their descent, and the scene down to a few years ago of an annual summer pilgrimage when the lady herself was expected to appear. The valley was at one time sparsely inhabited. It has been described as "lawless"; it was, doubtless, the very home of superstition. But during the last fifty years a revolution has taken place. Large industries have sprung up, and a considerable population of a much more civilised character has been attracted to the place. This revolution was in progress in the sixties; it was completed before Canon Evans's inquiries were set on foot. When we add to all this the fact, to which I have already drawn attention (ACADEMY, November 16, 1895), that those inquiries were not made for more than a quarter of a century after the alleged event, it is hard to see what importance can be attached to the schoolmaster's assertions. He may have been "an intelligent," but he was not a "competent person" to give satisfactory evidence; and it has yet to be proved that his evidence, such as it was, related to a larger area than the village of Llandeibie and its immediate surroundings—which do not come into the story at all. This is my reply to Mr. Thomas's first point.

His second point rests, I think, on a misapprehension. I have never identified "all these funeral customs with tribal feasts." What I have contended is, that Sin-eating is a relic of a specific feast of the kin, immediately following a death, at which feast the body of the deceased was eaten. It is therefore unnecessary "to argue that in Wales and the borders the whole of the tribal ceremonial was swallowed up in the Sin-eating." No doubt there were many tribal feasts of various kinds. I do not trace Sin-eating back to them all, nor indeed to any tribal feasts. A tribe is a local organisation. The tribe may have included many clans or kindreds; and, on the other hand, many clans may have stretched far beyond the bounds of the local tribe. It seems to have been the kindred who were entitled and expected to take part in the feast in question. I cannot adequately discuss the matter here, and must be pardoned for referring once more to the chapter on Funeral Rites in the Legend of Perseus (vol. ii.) where I have treated the subject in connexion with parallel practices in different parts of the world.

With Mr. Moggridge's sources and opportunities of information I have already dealt (ACADEMY, November 16). I believe his statement. But, even if we leave him out of account, there is enough in Pennant, Robert Jones of Rhoelan, and the Bishop of St. Asaph's MS. to corroborate Aubrey, who besides gives evidence of having carefully inquired into the matter.

Mr. Thomas's last paragraph would be more difficult to meet if it could be shown that Canon Silvan Evans's challenge was brought under the notice of Mr. Moggridge, or anyone else who was interested in the matter and in a position to investigate. But Mr. Moggridge was then an old man; he had left Wales. Canon Evans's contention was probably popular among Welshmen—at least, they were apathetic—and nobody seems to have been concerned to take up the challenge. It is a pity it was so; but this I think we must conclude was the reason why in 1878 (or was it not 1875?) "no one was produced who had ever seen" a Sin-eater.

"CAROON" IN THE NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

Dorney Wood, Burnham, Bucks: Feb. 14, 1896.

The earliest (and only) instances of the above word given in the New English Dictionary is taken from Simmonds's Dictionary of Trade (1858). The word Caroon, however, was in use at least a hundred years before this date, as is evident from the following extract from a letter of Gray to Thomas Wharton, dated July 21, 1759: "Duke-cherries are over in London . . . Caroons and blackhearts very large and fine drive about the streets in wheel-barrows a penny a pound." Further on in the same letter Gray adds, "Black caroons were ripe, and some duke-cherries still remained on walls the 26th."

SOME ARABIC BOOKS.

SEVERAL Arabic books of interest, and some of great importance, have been issued from the press during the last twelve months, and call for notice here.

Supplement to the Catalogue of the Arabic MSS. in the British Museum. By Charles Rieu, Ph.D. (Printed for the Trustees.) At the head of our list stands the great work in which Dr. Rieu has recorded, after a lapse of twenty-three years, the result of the administration, in the department of MSS., of the Arabic branch of the great Library of which he himself has been one of the most distinguished controllers. It is a noble record; and the volume, compared with that issued in 1846-71, marks the great advance which has of recent years been made in the art of cataloguing and describing Oriental works—an advance in a large measure due to the labours and example (in his Persian and Turkish Catalogues) of Dr. Rieu himself. Every one of the books here described has passed into the National collections under his own hands, and in the case of those purchased has been acquired upon his advice. No one—at least until the MSS. come to be minutely examined with a view to printing—can be so competent to render an account of them as he. The works described number 1303 MSS., and include the collections of many eminent persons—among them those of the late Sir H. Rawlinson, Baron Alfred von Kremer, and R. W. Lane, and that of Dr. Eduard Glaser. Particularly worthy of mention is the splendid collection of fifty MSS., including many important works by South Arabian scholars, presented to the Library by Col. S. B. Miles, an act of liberality which deserves the national gratitude. Time and space would fail us to call attention to, or even to mention, the many notable entries in this admirable catalogue. It is specially rich—chiefly by acquisition from Dr. Glaser—in theological works of the Zaidi sect, which was dominant for many centuries in the Yemen. In lexicographical material it is naturally, as the inheritor of Lane's collection, exceptionally complete. Among noteworthy rarities is a Kufic Kur'an (No. 56), which contains about two-thirds of the sacred volume, and probably dates from the eighth century A.D.: so extensive a survival of the earliest writing of Islam is unique. The Museum has added another volume (No. 607) to the portions of Ibn Khallikān's autograph of his Biographical Dictionary already in its possession. Another important autograph is a fragment of the Taj-al-'Arūs by Sayyid Murtadā (No. 836 III.). Another MS. deserving of special mention is a copy of al-Hariri's Makāmāt (No. 1006), in the handwriting of the author's grandson: al-Hariri died in A.H. 516, and this copy is dated 557. In poetry—at least in the classical poetry—the collection is, we are sorry to say, not very rich. Europe still lacks (except in the inadequate unvocalised modern copy from al-Madinah now at Leiden, and the half-burnt MS. of the Escorial) a diwān of the greatest poet of the Prophet's day, and the most quoted of all ancient Arab poets, al-A'shā of Kais. There is an excellent ancient MS. of an-Nahās's commentary on the Mu'allakāt, a work which is well worthy of a complete and critical edition, for which ample materials are now to hand. The most important other poetical MSS. are those of Jarir—No. 1032, part of the Diwān, and No. 1033, the Nakā'id, or poetical wranglings between him and his fellow-tribesman al-Farazdak.

Il Libro dei Verbi di Abu Bakr Muhammad b. Umar b. 'Abd-al-'Aziz Ibn al-Qāṭiyya. Pubblicato da Ignazio Guidi. (Leiden: Brill.)

We have here the most ancient of Arabic dictionaries of verbal roots, compiled by the Spanish philologist Ibn al-Kūṭiyyah ("son of the Goth mother"), who died in A.H. 367. Prof. Guidi has edited it from a unique MS., dated A.H. 534, preserved in the Lucchesian Library at Girgenti. The work is rarely cited by the long line of Arabian lexicographers—a consequence, Prof. Guidi thinks, of its extremely inconvenient arrangement, which follows an alphabetical order based upon the place of utterance of the initial letters of the roots. For this reason he supposes that copies of it were rarely made, and it thus dropped out of use. This defect, however, it shares with the much more famous lexicons of al-Khalil, al-Ashari, and Ibn Duraid, which are universally quoted and form the foundation of all Arabic lexicography; and it would seem that some other explanation of its unpopularity must be sought. Perhaps this may be found in its meagre exegesis and scantiness of examples. The vocalisation of the roots, their infinitives, and, more rarely, their nomina agentis, are the points to which Ibn al-Kūṭiyyah devotes his attention; the explicatory and illustrative part of the work is very concise, and the derived forms of the verb, except No. IV., are seldom noticed. Prof. Guidi has added a complete index of all the roots treated, which makes it possible conveniently to consult the book, in spite of the pedantic arrangement adopted by the author.

A Chrestomathy of Arabic Prose Pieces. By Dr. R. Brünnow. (Berlin: Reuther und Reichard.) This excellent collection of extracts has been compiled to accompany the third edition of Prof. Socin's Arabic Grammar, and replaces the texts which, in the earlier editions, formed a portion of the latter work. It may be heartily commended to all beginning the study of Arabic. The extracts comprise a legendary history of Queen Bilkis from ath-Tha'labi's "Tales of the Prophets," a series of historical notices relating to pre-Islamic history, the lives of the Prophet and his successors, and the Umawī Caliphs of Damascus, selections from the Kitāb al-Aghāni, three specimens of the Kur'an, and the celebrated grammatical treatise on terminal inflexion called the Ajurrūmiyyah. The text is followed by a sufficient glossary, in which the Arabic is explained in German and English. The book is likely to take a permanent place among aids to Arabic study, and in future editions will doubtless be brought to a still higher degree of accuracy than that already attained. We may notice, as requiring correction, a frequent confusion between inna and anna (especially after the verb kāla), and a slight uncertainty in dealing with proper names as diptote or triptote (Wāriddā, en p. 36, is very strange). On p. 32, l. 5, Uba'id should be 'Abid; on p. 41, l. 3, ad-Du'it should be ad-Du'at; and on p. 80, l. 6, Na'imū should be Nu'a'imū. Dr. Brünnow states in his preface that he has in many places abridged or altered the original text of the passages from which his historical selections are drawn; and it seems a pity that he has left uncorrected the absurd statement of Ibn Kutāibah (p. 28, l. 17) that Labid the poet was one of the warriors who slew al-Mundhir b. Ma'sa-Samā' of al-Hirah, and the same writer's story (p. 32, l. 5) connecting the death of 'Abid b. al-Abras with an-Nu'mān, the last king of al-Hirah, whereas it should be placed at least thirty years earlier. It may also be noticed that the date given for the plague at 'Amwās on p. 49, l. 17 (A.H. 18) does not agree with that mentioned in Appendix II. at p. 310 (A.H. 28); the latter is correct.

(Leiden: Brill.) This little treatise on chronology (or rather on the Hijri era, for the author has nothing concerning other than Muslim peoples), by the celebrated Egyptian man of letters of the fifteenth century, now printed for the first time from three MSS., at Tübingen and Berlin, is a pamphlet of fourteen pages. It does not contain anything very novel, and, in as-Suyūfī's well-known manner, consists chiefly of traditions supported by detailed isnāds. In pp. 8-10 there are some interesting details regarding the syntax and orthography of words and phrases relating to dates; on pp. 11, 12 the old Arab names of the days of the week, and on pp. 13, 14 those of the months, are given. The British Museum (Or. 1535, foll. 16-24) possesses a MS. of the Shamārikh, which has not been utilised in Dr. Seybold's edition.

Al-Fārābī's Abhandlung der Musterstaat. Aus Londoner und Oxford Handschriften herausgegeben von Dr. Friedrich Dieterici. (Leiden: Brill.) This short work by the great founder of scholastic philosophy among the Muslim races holds to Al-Fārābī's other compositions a place in some respects similar to that of the Republics of Plato and Aristotle to the rest of their respective systems. The title, which Prof. Dieterici has abbreviated into "The Model State," may be more fully rendered—"The opinions of the inhabitants of the most excellent state." But the treatise is not primarily one of political philosophy. More than fifty of its eighty-five pages, which set forth the right opinions, according to the author's view, concerning the nature of God, the constitution of the universe, matter and form, bodies heavenly and earthly, and the constitution of man, have to be traversed before we arrive at the chapter dealing with "the necessity of union and mutual help for mankind," and proceed to consider what sort of ruler the most excellent state should possess, wherein its excellency consists, how its parts are compacted together, and what objects its citizens set before them in life. The work terminates with a review of the defects in those states which are not excellent, and mistake the proper methods of government and objects of the existence of man. (It is not obvious, by the way, why the table of contents should stop at chap. xxxiv. and p. 75, when there are still three numbered chapters and ten pages to be accounted for.) The text might with advantage have been more liberally vocalised and provided with marks of punctuation. The editor promises a translation shortly.
